It seemed important enough for him to post his usual insulting crap, "Leo". I'm sure that future generations will learn a great deal about amateur radio from the misinformation and disinformation put forth by Leonard H. Anderson.

There are other readers of the newsgroup who don't know you to be Leo, "Leo". I am Dave and my amateur radio callsign is K8MN. Drop me a line at K8MN@arrl.net and see who responds, "Leo". You're still sniping anonymously.

It certainly appears that the puppet master is doing the dancing and that the supposed puppets are calling the tune, "Leo".

Dave, do you recall telling us about the relationship between spelling and leadership, then you misspelled a word?

Careful about getting caught up in your own catch-22s.

Did the DXer lower himself to working a contest? I recall one notorious DXer saying that working DX in a Contest isn't DXing.

BTW, were you using your small loops to recieve?

I agree on the MURS part after doing some reading. Seems to me though that "you may use any means at your disposal in case of an emergency" as the tech test says. I think you would even be legal in an emergency.

Language morphs all the time. Innacurate isn't even a new morph. It's been used by politicians for years to say "lying" without saying lying.
I can use the word quite correctly. I was a little concerned when the word accurate was used in the expression of an opinion. Opinions don't have to be accurate. So when my opinions are decried as innacurate, I start to wonder.

Apparently, he's not allowed to use the word "sexual" either - or
"anal," LOL.

His mommy keeps him on a tight leash, it seems. :)

I like it . . . but it's rather long.

Or how about FuckMonkey4Homeless? It's long, too, but I see him as more of a homeless felcher than cell-block toi.

Ooooh . . . he finds a way. I think most of his um . . .
accouterments are from his mommy's lingerie drawer, though.

22. Will "no code" license result in meaningful growth?

Newsgroup: rec.radio.amateur.policy

From: "Carl R. Stevenson" <wk3cqth@wk3c.com> Message-ID: <tQedneaSub8w-1zYUSdV9g@ptd.net>
Source record: 182276

Information from within ARRL indicates that last year the ARRL VECs, whose teams handle over 70% ov al VE sessions, per their claim (which I am not confirming nor disputing), performed over 5,000 VE sessions (with each session handling multiple applicants/testees).

According to the report, the average session was 5-10 applicants/testees ... (25-50k testees)

"Reservations" have now jumped to 50-75/session!!!

It appears that no-code WILL result in significant growth. (as I predicted)

While some who want to keep our bands "to themselves" (at least until they're reallocated for lack of/diminishing use) will bemoan this, I am elated!

From what I've seen, the ARRL BoD is "Getting It" about the need to welcome new hams and strongly discourage any berating/insulting/bad treatment of them just because they didn't have to take a Morse test. BRAVO!

I hope that ALL hams will "get with the program" and act like decent human beings/Elmers towards the impending, apparently significant influx of newcomers.

Treat them right and they will assimilate - treat the crappy and you'll regret it in the long run.

That's pretty good . . . but with my efforts, I was trying to make sure that even the st00pidest dolt (AKA Porchy) could see that the main gist of the name was referring to his overall pussy-ness.

Porchy was hatched - he has no "mommy."

I still think the whole thing is more of a mating ritual for f'loons.
Though I think Porchy's best bet at propagating will be by artificial insemination. I mean - do YOU think you could find a dick that small?
I'd think half your tries to snatch the tiny thing would result in pulled pubes.

It's a fair bet Fuckmonkey4Felons is a setter rather than a pointer.
Otherwise there's a rilly pissy pair of hands leaving the bathroom.

I hope you aren't going to try to attribute such a statement to me.
I never wrote any such thing. There's plenty of DX to be worked in a contest. I've been contesting since before I ever chased DX.

When replying to Lion'sAs$ you should always mention his momma's flapjack t1tties and how his girlfriend has a penis and goes by the name Marvin. You should then mention how his daddy first initiated Lion'sAs$ into the world of An@l Sex. And how his daddy gives him facials and how Lion's As$ will only take golden showers and is deathly afraid of soap and water. You can then mention how is momma has the worst lice and ringworm infection in your undouched pus$y. You can then go on to discuss how Lion's As$ has an affinity for women who refuse to douche like his momma and MaxC*nt.

This should get the ball rolling nicely.

That's excellent!

Well, maybe.

We don't know if those reservations are for new hams, or for existing hams
planning to upgrade.

We also don't know how long the "surge" will last.

Back in 2000, when both the Morse Code and written testing were reduced, there was a surge of growth. But it only lasted a short time, and now we're more than 18,000 US hams fewer than we were in May 2000. (see the long-lived thread "ARS License Numbers" for exact numbers).

IOW, the growth from the last license-requirements change did not last. Hopefully, that won't be the case with this change.

I don't know any who want to "keep the bands to themselves". Who would they be?

There are folks with differing ideas as to what the requirements for a license will be.

Remember that it's a two-way street, as well.

We'll see about the growth in a few weeks/months/years.

Good to hear from you, Carl.

When you gag on Marvin's c0ck do you make gurgling noises or have you learned to control that better. MaxWhore cangive you great advice on that. I hear that you need to get deloused again. Hey when you start sniff around MaxWhore's toxic sn@tch, things will be jumping off for dear life (like fleas, ticks, ringworms, lice, ..., etc). Even insects are disturbed by MaxWhore's toxic pus$y. But since your mom was a total whore like MaxWhore, you must be used to the skank's stench. And it's not like you don't have a stench of your own, Lion'sAs$

Is that NEW applicants or merely upgraders. I've had no increase in new applicants making reservations but a significant increase in upgraders.

Also it is too soon to determine if this is simply a short term phenomenon or will it sustain itself.

By the way would you care to enter a guess in my pool as to the percent increase in amateur numbers in one year beginning from the date of the implementation? Here are the rules and the current pool of guesses.

Rules:

1) Predict amount of change in ARS numbers between the IMPLEMENTATION date of the R&O for elimination of code testing and one year from that date.
2) Calculation of the number of licenses will be done by N2EY under the same principals that he uses now to calculate the number of licenses.
3) You must select whole numbers for your percentage.
4) You may select positive or negative percentages.
5) You may select a range but that range may not exceed a total of 4%.
Note that your average will be used to determine who is closest. If the actual change is outside the range of everyone's guesses then the person whose limit is closest will be the winner.
6) You must submit your guess no later than six months after the IMPLEMENTATION date of the R&O.

Anyone else? Note if your guess doesn't show up on the list within a week, it may mean that my ISP is blocking it or that you are on my blocked senders list. You may still participate but you will have to have your guess submitted by someone who is not blocked.

Guesses submitted:

N8UZE: 1% less to 1% more N2EY: 1% more to 2% more

KH6HZ: 1% less to 0% change
N3KIP: 2% more to 6% more KH6O: 6% more to 10% more KK6J: 12% more to 14% more
KC2HMZ: 5% more <--- Added 12/31/06

Any one that f*cks with me gets deal with. It's just that simple. You miscalculated badly and are still paying for it, ying collective associate. Next time know who you're f*cking with and what the consequence of f8cking with the person will be.

I once ran out of gas on I10 in West Texas at night during sub-freezing weather. After trying 146.52 for about 20 minutes with no response, I considered that to be enough of an emergency to tune my IC-706 to 4w AM on the CB trucker's channel and ask for help.
A kind trucker gave me a lift to the next town and another trucker gave me a lift back to my vehicle.

Yep, you need to buy me a new one . . . how long do you think it will take you to save up $200?

Nevermind . . . by the time you were able to save up that kind of dough from your paper route, it'd be obsolete technology anyway.

Since you're the only pussy here, I can only assume that you want someone to douche your gaping maw . . . sorry, I'm not interested. :)

TIP: Maybe if you stop cocksucking all the regs here in AUK, you won't need to douche yourself so often,

Hi Dee,

The point is as I see it, that when we place what we see and read into the hands of others, we might not see what we want to see. I am perfectly happy to use Xnews to get rid of the fringe elements.

And at what level do we censor. And let us mince no words, a post that does not get past the moderator is censored.

An example is that you have decided to filter out posts from Len Anderson. On the other hand, I enjoy reading his posts, even though I don't always agree with them, and sometimes the arguments with Jim and Dave can get a little circular. (from all posters)

But I can't imagine the newsgroup without him. Or Jim, or Dave.

What would you do as a censor-moderator to his posts? How about the posts where two people disagree, and one notes that he thinks the other is being unrealistic? Obtuse? Stupid? Where is the line?

I find the same posts offensive that you do, with the exception of Len's. But I really prefer to make my own choices instead of have someone else make them for me.

No, I wouldn't call it censorship. After all, they have other outlets to spout off. If some outside force put a clamp on their speaking, that would be censorship.

I really hate to admit this, but I have been paying attention since this issue of a moderated newsgroup came up. And while there are some obvious spewers here, I now see it's not just their fault.

There really is too much animosity between some posters, so everything turns into that animosity, rather than discussing the specific issue at hand.

The people behind the proposed moderated newsgroup might start with talking to some of the sensible ones, convincing them to stop dredging up the past of regular posters here. Or convince them that making a single statement, and walking away from that thread says a lot more than keeping the thread going for weeks and arguing over small points (especially when it's often a rehash of the last long thread).

I talk about "sensible posters" because while it may reflect my bias, I do think some are more likely to see the damage they are doing to the newsgroup than others. And if "one side" can stop it, then that doesn't leave much fuel for "the other side".

The animosity in this (well these, since .misc tends to be in tandem with this newsgroup for many posts) newsgroup is actually reflected in the discussion of this proposed moderated newsgroup. I take offence to what really appears to be an "outsider" wanting to bring a moderated newsgroup and then thinks that's reason to extend it to the whole hierarchy.
Yet the hostility here is such that everything has become binary, either you're for or against something, and if you sound like your own "the other side" that places you there even if you're trying to make a third point or build common ground.

In looking at this situation more closely, again since the RFD came down, realistically the proponent has been after a moderated newsgroup for a long time. The "straw vote" some years back, and various comments about the decline of usenet. Even, as a recent post reminds me, the email to new posters about the hierarchy. I've been around so long that I'd completely forgotten about that and likely I'm not the only one. Yet, where is his presence? I'm not even talking about being part of the "community" of posters, I'm talking about coming to the hierarchy as a whole, trying to unite it in the first place rather than dealing with two of the newsgroups and then when the proposed name is wrong, seeing that as an opportunity to get all the topics into this one moderated newsgroup.

There is a sizeable difference between posting a formal RFD, and actually being a real person and saying something like "we do have a problem here, how can we fix it", because then it's some guy like a neighbor. Instead the proponent has come with an answer that hasn't necessarily been seen as the answer. I'm not arguing that there is a problem in .misc and .policy (and the rest of the hierarchy when it spills over), and even not arguing that something shouldn't be done about it, I'm not convinced enough preliminary work has been done to show that a moderated newsgroup is the only solution.

There used to be a guide to the hierarchy, well it's still on the web and I'm pretty sure it was periodically posted to the newsgroups. That ought to be resurrected as a prelude to talk of a moderated newsgroup. Because then it's addressing the hierarchy as a whole, rather than the nonsense of posting the RFD to .policy and .misc and then turning the discussion to "well maybe we should make it a moderated newsgroup for all the hierarchy". The 2nd RFD broadened the posting, yet it still didn't deal with the whole hierarchy (or the notion that if .antennas and .dx have talked about moderated versions in the past, it may be because the feud here spills over there, something that again might be limited by one side refusing to argue with the other).

Then there's the issue of there being moderated "newsgroups" already. All that web-based stuff. Lots of people have moved there, we see it as the number of posts drop. Though I'm not completely convinced it's an issue of moderation, they may have found they prefer the web based areas, and so they left as soon as they were developed. So the intent of the proposed moderated newsgroup, that it will bring back posters, may turn out to be something that does't happen.

Technically, the moderator would have to be some sort of official in order for him to be able to possess the power of censorship. It is not censorship when QEX rejects my material.

refusing to argue is conceeding the issue man and has been seen here tends to lead to an escalation fo the attacks by the other side in an

I agree that is true. Yet I see no way to get people to censor themselves. And yes I can and have added my own filters with no problems. However this only makes the filth invisible, it doesn't do a thing to clean it up. The real problem is that it spreads. If person X gets away with it, then person Y thinks its OK too. Eavesdrop on a bunch of today's middle school kids and you'll really get an earful. That type of behavior gets carried over into adult life. Work places now have to have training to let their employees know it is NOT ok to act this way in the workplace.

All that I would do would be to return them to the writer and tell him to delete the name calling and when resubmitted would let them on through. His tendency to go off-topic and write long-winded diatriabes doesn't bother me. I like lively debates and disagreements so long as civility is maintained, name calling is excluded and ad hominem attacks are not allowed. His general writing style is quite good.

Telling a person that they are acting stupid is quite different than telling them they are stupid. However my opinion is telling them they are acting stupid is ok, telling them the are stupid is marginal, while name calling is unacceptable (Nun of the Above, Herr Oberst, and so on).

Well that's the nice thing about keeping the old group in addition to creating a new one. A person can choose where to go and when to go there. The creation of a moderated group gives us the freedon to have it both ways and enhances our choices.

Notice that the ones objecting most strenuously are the ones that make a habit of unpleasant behavior. It seems to me that they are afraid they will lose their targets.

Odd that you would consider this interchange "sniping" - if I agreed with you, would it become a "conversation"? Sure would!

And no, the definition of anonymous is "having no known name " - mine's Leo! Whether you believe that or not is completely irrelevant to me.

Should I prefer to communicate with K8MN, I would use the ham bands to do so (where your callsign, and mine, are both relevant and required by law). But you're not there - you're here! Usenet ain't radio, OM.

What we need to do is recruit OUTSIDE the newsgroups and let people know that it exists and what they can do with it. People in the amateur radio newsgroups are either already licensed or know something about ham radio.
It's the people who know little to nothing about it that we need to get the word to so that they can decide if this is an activity that they want to get involved in.

Yep, that's right.

In fact Carl, WK3C, was a major contributor to a local radio club prize for the last person in the club to pass Element 1.
(See his earlier posting at the start of a different thread for details.)

Hopefully, the upcoming changes to the license requirements will result in a new era of long-term growth in amateur radio, as has been repeatedly predicted and promised by many of those in favor of the changes.

But what if it doesn't?

A question might be "what are you going to do to insure that it doesn't?
(Not you specifically)

My group is already working to make sure that the new folks don't feel shunned, and in recognition that many of the new folks will be inexperienced as compared to years past, we plan on some pretty extensive Elmering. It should be great fun.

One possible fly in the ointment is that just as there are Hams who wouldn't upgrade to Extra because their advanced license proved they took a higher speed code test, there are some who will probably do all they can to have their dire predictions be a self fulfilling prophecy.

Well I keep trying to spread the word on ham radio and try to get people to try the hobby. However, batting zero here. If my hypothesis is correct that we've basically "saturated the market" then the best we can hope for is a sustainable level but no long term growth. I have met many people who have heard little to nothing about ham radio until I start talking about it. I've met no one who has stayed away because of any test requirements. The ones I've talked to don't even know that we have to be licensed.

We aren't talking about QEX though. This is - at best - a forum for discussion of ideas. If I have an idea, and I'm not allowed to post it, or if I have a reply to anoters post that is simply a bit off the topic, as converstations between friends sometimes veer from an original subject, then call it what we will, of we're not allowed to say it - it is censored. That is what a moderator does.

Count me as an Advanced Class licensee who plans to upgrade (and keep my 2x3 callsign). However, before doing so, I intend to obtain a >= 20wpm Morse proficiency certificate.

No, you're not censored.

You could post to another USENET forum.
You could email your idea individually to people.
You could form another forum.
You could set up a web site dedicated to your idea.

Most non-technical people I run into, where the topic of ham radio comes up, end up saying one of two things. Either

1) "Oh, you're one of those guys with the unsightly cell tower in your yard"

or

2) "Yeah my neighbor had one of you guys next door, and he couldn't watch his tv or vcr any longer cuz you you guys"

My neighbor wanted to become a ham, but I told him all the calls were

A similar situation happened back in the Spring of 2000, when 5WPM coders could become generals and extras. Lots of new hams on the HF phone bands. I was one of 'em. Aside from a few various newbie errors, we learned pretty quickly. I would expect the same to be true of the no code hams who become generals and extras in the spring of 2007.

Yup and I'll do my best to welcome them (and perhaps coax them to try cw) and answer any of their questions that I am capable of or point them to someone who can answer them.. I've NEVER subscribed to the filter theory.
My reason for wanting to keep code testing was that I believed it to be a basic skill that all should learn at a basic level. Nothing more and nothing less.

I would agree with M. Coslo on that, not M. Black. <shrug>

Censorship is still censorship, whether one uses the euphemism of "moderating." "Censorship" doesn't automatically carry a negative, "bad" tag. Sometimes it IS good and for our own security. Case in point in the USA during WW II: Overseas mail was examined by censors and, if it fell under some criterion of suspicion, or even the contents of same service personnel's mail, it was blacked out. Literally. That is past history and few in here were alive when that happened, but it was on a large scale.

"Censorship" should not mean all "offensive" posts are deleted. The biggest problem is Judgement of what is Offensive. That approaches the USA's constant arguments of "sexually offensive" content when there is no real, decisive definition of what IS offensive in that area.

What exists below your southern border in amateur radio is a great deal of in-grained attitudes of What [USA] Amateur Radio Should Be. That has been a sort of mental conditioning by the surviving national amateur radio membership organization. Since this organization has a VIRTUAL (through numbers, not in the legal sense) monopoly on special amateur-interest publications, it has the capability to set patterns of behavior, influence desires (very subtly) of what activity should be engaged in, and generally be looked at as some kind of "boss" of all, complete with Titles and so-called democratic-process lower-level "voting" which is far from what the US government voting entails with its attendant checks-and-balances. Those aren't the "same" democratic ways, just some inferences. It is difficult to find out what is exactly going on in that organization since they have this virtual monopoly on amateur radio information in the USA.

Of course there is. There has been for a decade in here.
Longer. The "morse code test" issue arguments had gotten such that a separate "policy" newsgroup begun to steer the morse code test issue into a separate venue, RRAP.

Whether or not to eliminate the morse code test was a HIGHLY contentious subject, especially down here.. The alignment of opinions was, by simple observation, polarized about as far as such could be. In such a highly-charged environment of polarized opinions, it was easy to "cross the line" into personal attack regardless of the logic, real logic not euphemisms of what posed for logic.

The big problem came about when the "established" saw perceived personal attack for some of their arrogant power-play activities. They bristled and then attacked their "opponents" in much less than FB terms. Those had achieved self-righteous "control" (they thought) and wanted to keep what they thought was Theirs.

Also quite present has been the "credentialism" aspect of those that had achieved Titles, Rank, Status under the old rules and their territorial imperative claims for that. I have nothing against Titles, Rank, or Status in any hobby activity but do bridle at such things used to infer that some are "stupid" or "inferior" in radio (or electronics) JUST BECAUSE some individuals had "earned" such Titles, Rank, and Status some while ago in a specialized genre of hobby radio activity. That spoke of an extreme self-righteousness on their part. Given a highly optionalized hobby activity (from governmental law) they needed (?) all to conform to Their idea of What Should Be. They never had that power in the first place but once they had it, their addiction did not let them stop.

The "people behind the proposed moderated group" ought to look at some of the things ALREADY allowed: Deliberate cross-posting to several newsgroups at the same time; degeneration into many, many posts which are quite obviously insulting and sexually-oriented by any "community standards," not the least of which is the NON-subject-to-a-newsgroup's general subjects. Part of that is obvious pseudonyms including the attempts at copying others' pseudonyms. I've posted to Google, my own (and only) avenue of posting and got NO response on those obvious ones.
The pseudonyms are obvious by their content and, in many cases, length of text content consisting (seemingly) of endless
"quoting" of old material plus "signatures" of old-style ASCII character graphics.

I agree with you that old, old subjects are NOT good for delving into. Those that lost old arguments in the past will not "win" anything by trying to repeat it all. Neither is this some formal court where self-appointed barristers can demand absolute, unequivocal "proof" of their perceived slights. Let them spend some time powdering their wigs and cleaning their own robes before hitting their Queens Bench.

The biases can exist on the proposed moderator's side as well.
There has been the undertone of "only we know how to moderate."
Moderation or censorship or controlling content has been done well before the Internet became public in 1991, even on an international networked system of BBSs. I've been there and done that, know how it feels to BE a moderator. The main thing a moderator MUST refrain from is to get engaged or "side" on a contentious subject IN PUBLIC. Their credibility can disappear almost immediately doing that. Simple rule and cannot be countermanded by "credentialism" or self-righteousness about being a moderator. Those who do moderation MUST give up doing anything in public other than advising or the behind-the-scenes warnings and actual deletions.

Based on my experiences as a user and as moderator on BBSs, ones where in-person meetings were the norm, not just on-line, there comes a time to DO something. That was reached a couple years ago in RRAP. Nothing was done then. I don't expect anything will ever be done now or in the future. Draconian measures are required to get things to some semblance of normalcy. All the "requests for discussion" won't help.
All those RFDs (plural) are, to me, boondoggle business of endless jabbering in place of taking action. It may make the jabberer feel good inside but it's all busy work, what some say is equivalent to "teaching a pig to sing."

The powers-that-be will probably issue a 4th RFD, a 5th, etc., until everyone gets sick and tired of it all and bail. What's the point of an "endless summer" of jabbering when NOTHING happens? "Fish or cut bait." So far as I see the bait hasn't even been collected. :-(

>Then there's the issue of there being moderated "newsgroups" already.

I see that "web-based stuff," (non-"Usenet" discussion and argument sites), to be nothing more than COMPETITION.
Bulletin Board Systems of old got out-classed by the Internet going public. TS. Consider that as normal
"market-driven" cause-effect. The core issue of moderation-censorship-control-of-content is the SAME in all of them.
One very small group in each governs each group's actions.
The "governing bodies" will be subject to all kinds of bouquets and brickbats depending on what they do, despite whatever real or imagined altruism they feel.
All too often the slightest brickbat will set them off on the "fault" of their users. Not so. It is THEIRS.
It is up to them to correct it. If not the users simply go away. Simple competition at work. The Internet is too large and there will always be alternatives. A wry saying is "mankind invented language to satisfy his need to complain." That need seems to be ever-present. :-)

I personally have no need to go to any new group. My intent was always to advocate the elimination of the code test in US amateur radio. The US government has ruled. Yet, the old animosities of the self-righteous must continue. Those are too allied with the old paradigms of What Should Be to change with the times.

I think that there should be areas where people can express themselves. The hide-bound do not. They desire the familiarity of the known, the "safe," Theirs (in effect).
If they cannot take criticsm, then They can go away, not their perceived enemies. The world was not meant for them and them alone to rule.

Okay, "lock and load..." :-)

Nah. The recipients just act like the (fictitious) Colonel Jessup, blurting out "They can't handle the truth!" as their excuse.

Those who watched the film "A Few Good Men" seem to have forgotten that the Colonel was arrested in court and taken out under guard.

No sweat...they can't see their own parallel since they can't fathom drawing two lines in the same direction from anything said against their self-righteous opinions.

"Return them to the writer?" Are you presuming you are a publication editor now?!? I've been on both sides of an editor's desk. This is NOT some publication that will appear three to four months after "acceptance."

Try on the old trite phrase, "If you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen." Remember also that you are NOT the supreme judge of What Should Be.

"Filtering out" all who do not agree with you is simply the old self-righteous ostrich syndrome. It really means that you cannot stand the opinions of your 'opponents' and opposite viewpoints are not desired. When you try to say you "like debate" that is just hypocritical lip-service.

If someone acts as arrogant as some have in here they should welcome the "title" they have worked so hard for.
If another wants to ruler-spank what he/she thinks are naughty children then they should not be upset when the "children" turn out to be unfriendly to them.

There can be safety and security among a group of like-minded.
All can sit around and give each other high-fives for being so "brilliant, brave, strong, wise, etc., etc., etc." In there you can severely criticize all who DARE oppose such "brilliant, brave, strong, wise et-ceteras" in complete, but false, presumption that you rule. Self-deception in addition to self-righteousness.

"Targets" are a penny a dozen (the price is down due to a glut on the market). They grow and flourish everywhere.

If you guys want to sit here and say that there is no reason for hams to discuss methods to recruit new hams here because the only people on the newsgroups are the ones who recruit new hams, go ahead. I can't make you. However, don't bemoan the lack of growth among the ranks.

What word is it that you want to get out? That you can talk to people in foreign lands? That it is a good hobby for older people who are shut in to be able to talk to new friends? That you can use it for reliable communications with family and friends? How about the public service aspects such as SKYWARN and ARIES? This is just a quick list of things that I can think of because, as I already said, time is kind of short for me right now and I think that brainstorming is a much better method. That's why I suggested it.

What are the competitors to ham radio? GMRS, FRS, MURS, cell phones, CB, etc.? What are the comparative advantages and disadvantages of each of these? Why would ham radio be a better choice.

Then you could discuss market demographics. What kind of people might be interested in ham radio? How about hunters and fishermen who may want to be able to talk back people who are out with them? Perhaps people who are interested in off grid living and homesteaders? Perhaps farmers who want to be able to call back to the house when they are out in the field? How about emergency communications like being able to either call home or get someone else to call home for you when your car is broke down? This list too could be a lot longer.

Once you decide what the demographics are, you could look at what kinds of media do these people read? I can tell you right now, it's not ham specific magazines such as QST. Ideas that come to mind, based on the list that I've provided are the various newsgroups and list servers that cater to their needs. Magazines that sell to homesteaders such as Countryside Magazine or Mother Earth. All kinds of hunting and fishing magazines out there. There are a lot of media outlets tailored to older people and people on a tight budget/fixed income. You could also look at organizations publications of specific groups. This list too is abbreviated.

Two of the barriers to people getting a ham license that I run into quite a bit are the Morse Code requirement and a lot of people don't realize that there is a difference between ham and CB. The code barrier is gone and that is a good lead in as to why someone may want to consider ham radio even if they had dismissed it at an earlier time.

Then someone could look back over the various open discussions and write an article to be submitted to any of the various media describing the advantages of ham radio over other methods. People who otherwise hadn't considered ham radio as an option for their particular needs may get a chance to see that it is indeed an option that would meet a need. It's not only a good chance to promote ham radio in a media read by someone other than hams, you might make a little money from it. There are many here with excellent writing skills who are capable of doing it.

The other option is to take a fatalistic viewpoint that the market is saturated and growth is impossible. To that, I say that marketing is everything and right now the vast majority of marketing is keyed towards those already in ham radio. It's a policy that I disagree with and if no one else wants to do it, it's something that I will do alone as soon as time permits. However, that may be after the current widow of opportunity created by dropping the code requirement has passed and that would be truly unfortunate.

My owned little trisexual freak is whining again about his enslavement. The as$clown is in the process of learning who he can and can't f*ck with. This b1tch though my abuse of him would stopped weeks

His bottom b1tch, MaxWhore, is still douche-defiant as ever. I fear for the ozone layer and for the planet as a whole. Her pus$ystank is no joke.

I didn't write that I have no interest in islands on the air. I wrote that I have no interest in Islands On The Air. Do you know what is on the 10 mosted needed countries list or the 100 most needed countries list? Do you know which countries I need or which band or mode on which I need them?

I've never seen you, looking or not. You made a claim, added a couple of additional snide comments. You've not backed it up as it isn't factual. I would think that you'd want to produce evidence that your statement has merit.

I gave you the 2001 list earlier. Here's the Fall 2006 top ten:

1 BS7 SCARBOROUGH 1
2 VU7 LAKSHADWEEP 2
3 P5 NORTH KOREA 3
4 7O YEMEN 5
5 KP1 NAVASSA 6
6 FR/G GLORIOSO 9
7 3Y/B BOUVET 8
8 KP5 DESECHEO 7
9 ZS8 MARION ISLAND 12
10 VKï¿½/H HEARD ISLAND 13

I need numbers 1, 3 and 6.

Should I use my transmit antenna for receiving? Would it offend you if I have optional antennas for transmitting/receiving?

Here's my version:

1) Ham radio exists today

2) It's very different from other kinds of radio, such as cb, GMRS/FRS, broadcasting, etc.

3) You can do a wide variety of things with ham radio, including some that you can't do in other radio services. There are only a few things you cannot do in ham radio (commercial operation, music. broadcasting).

4) Ham radio operation requires FCC licensing. Getting a license requires passing multiple choice tests and making an application to FCC.

5) Ham radio is essentially "radio for its own sake" - an end in itself more than a means to an end.

6) One word: FUN!

> What are the competitors to ham radio? GMRS, FRS, MURS, cell phones, > CB, etc.? What are the comparative advantages and disadvantages of > each of these? Why would ham radio be a better choice.

I'd be careful with that one.

I think one of the main reasons for lack of growth over the past several years has been that for a long time now ham radio has been presented as a sort of "personal radio service", with emphasis on radio as a means to an end rather than an end in itself. The problem with that approach is that as soon as a technology appears that also serves that end, we lose out.

I think that amateur radio will continue to exist only if it emphasizes how it is unique, rather than how it is similar to other radio services.

The problem is that most of what you describe is about radio as a means to an end rather than radio for its own sake. FRS, GMRS, and cell phones can already do most or all of what is written above.

The thing to point out is what amateur radio can do that other radio services cannot:

- Wide variety of modes and bands
- Homebrew, kit or manufactured equipment, old to new technologies.
- Local, regional, national, international and even space communications without dependence on commercial infrastructure.
- Competition (radiosport)
- Public service communications
- Emergency communications

This is a very good point. Here are some more ideas:

- Ads/articles in boating, camping, RVing and flying magazines
- Highly visible amateur radio exhibits at air shows, town fairs, parades, etc.
- Community-access cable TV and public radio/TV exposure
- Placement of amateur radio magazines, books and other material in local schools, particularly middle schools.

I don't think the Morse Code test is the "barrier" that it is often said to be, but that's soon to be a moot point.

I do think confusion between cb and Amateur Radio has really hurt growth in Amateur Radio for many years.

I also think that complete ignorance, or gross misunderstanding, of the existence of Amateur Radio is a continuing problem.

> Then someone could look back over the various open discussions and Perhaps - but that method emphasizes "means to an end".

I say the best selling point is that simply going on the air and making contacts is a heck of a lot of fun. So is designing, building, testing, fixing and repairing your own radio setup. That's what ham radio is really all about, isn't it?

It's like trying to sell sailboats instead of motorboats by emphasizing how a sailboat doesn't need lots of fuel the way a motorboat does, and is only a bit slower than many motorboats. You may sell a few sailboats that way, but it's not the best approach IMHO.

The way to sell sailboats is to sell the unique experience of sailboating itself - how it makes you feel, how much fun it is, etc.
Sailing as an end in itself. Some people will "get it", most won't.

Of course most people's motivations to do something are a mix of the practical and the emotional. So the ultimate goal is to appeal to both of those, not just the practical.

How something is sold is very important, though. If we sell amateur radio only by what it can do for your personal communications needs, we will always be at the mercy of the next technological improvement.

Short ribs. Slow cooked for 24 hours in a crock pot.

Dave,

It's a safe bet that there will be no evidence presented to back up that "contesting isn't DXing" claim by "hot-ham-and-cheese".

That's because he just doesn't do that. He makes inaccurate claims that somebody wrote something, but when challenged, does not provide any quotes or other objective evidence.

For example, he has claimed that I misstated the distance from the earth to the moon here. That's not true, but he won't admit it.

>I would think that you'd want to produce evidence that your > statement has merit.

You are mistaken, Dave. It's not about producing evidence or proving the merit of his statements.

It's about "hot-ham-and-cheese" getting attention.

Several posters believe that making snide, one-line "snippets" make them witty, while they sit behind their keyboard laughing at their own genius.

Naturally, it pisses them off to no end that soon, with the moderated newsgroup, they will no longer have that ability.

Perhaps if they actually conversed in a dialogue, they'd get some enjoyment from this aspect of ham radio. However, I suspect that their real involvement with ham radio consists of little more than what they contribute to this forum -- nothing.

You misunderstood. I did not say we should not talk about methods. I said actually recruiting here is not going to help as those who don't know about ham radio won't be here.

All these methods must be used as you never know what will pique some one's interest.

See above. However, interest can come from any person. The particular uses you list here however will be better served by other alternatives.

That was my point. You've got to go "outside".

As far as magazines go, unless you want to pay for ad space, you've got to find a way to tie it into an area of interest actually covered by the magazine to try to get it published. I think this should be given a try though.

I agree with the CB idea but no one that I ran into even knew about the code requirement. So I doubt that the latter was significant.

That's not necessarily fatalistic but something one must be aware of in order to tailor their recruiting approach.

Market saturation is a fact that all retail manufacturer's face. And they deal with it. This applies to everything from toasters to cars to TV programming to any hobby you can name. For example, there's no growth in the US toaster market. Each manufacturer works on keeping their market share or growing their share. Similarly, we will have to show why our activity deserves more of a person's free time than other activities.

I do agree that the "marketing" of our hobby does need to be much better than it is. We need to seek out and find those that would be interested. Those that perhaps lack interest only because they have not heard about it or know very little about it.

Marketing the hobby is not the same as marketing the hardware or a specific aspect of ham radio within the ham community. Current marketing is focusing on the latter items. I hope you do get out and market our hobby. Many of us do promote the hobby within our circle of family, friends, acquaintances, co-workers, etc.

I would like to take code exams even if they are not required by the FCC.

Will VEs continue to conduct code exams and perhaps offer wpm level certificates?

extremely doubtful

I suspect other organizations, like FISTS, may step up to the plate and offer some type of competency certificates, if you're really interested in such things.

Despite what you read here, from a few embittered people who feel the code exam "persecuted" them, most hams on the airwaves really don't care if you passed a 5, 13, or 20wpm code test or not.

Why? Well, if I CQ in morse code on a frequency at 25wpm, and you respond, and we have a nice conversation -- does it really matter if you "passed" a 20wpm code test or not?

Yes, with planned obsolescence.

Not exactly the same thing in ham radio, nor can we really deal with it the same way.

Carl 'ole bean you're making some some very dicey assumptions and extrapolations here. What evidence do you have which indicates that this latest lurch will result in anything beyond just another bubble of upgrades a la 1991 and 2000?

The simple fact of the matter is that we're into a very mature avocation based on an ancient basic technology which lost it's sex appeal in the general population years ago. I agree with others in this thread, we'll be lucky to regain the 18,000 the hobby has already lost since the head count peaked.

I do hope you're prepared to eat some crow if your predictions don't come true.

> While some who want to keep our bands "to themselves" (at least until > they're reallocated for lack of/diminishing use)

As you well know the HF ham bands are not under any threats, they're not going anywhere for a very long time.

It'll be interesting to see if the upgraders actually generate a noticeable increase in HF band activity levels. Techs have been able to become licensed without a code test for 15 years, they spend say spend $175 for a 2M FM rig and a few bucks for a little easy-up 2M antenna and they're on the air. Which is good and now they can upgrade to nocode Generals and Extras. And oops, they run into the much higher costs of HF equipment and all the hassles related to putting up HF antennas.

If they weren't previously interested enough in ham radio to do the work required to pass the 5WPM code test will they now be interested enough in ham radio to spend the bigger bucks and get HF antennas up in the new regime?

When was the last time anybody paid any attention to the ARRL's unending stream of admonitions about playing nice? 1928?

This whole topic area is worn out overblown nonsense. There are >600,000 licensed hams in the U.S. with maybe 150,000-200,000 actually active. Of this group there are some misfits, maladroits and nutcases whose influence on the welfare of the hobby has been hugely overrated.
This BS is nothing more than an excuse, a copout, a handy rationale of covenience which blames the lack of growth of the hobby on these anti-social types.

I don't believe for one minute that their behavior has any really measurable impact on the growth - or lack of growth of the total head count. Bits and pieces of anti-social behavior are everywhere we go, out on the streets, at meetings, in this NG, on the job and yes on the ham bands too. That's life and we deal with it in other sectors without whining about it like too many do when ham radio is involved.
Adapt or find another hobby because thee, the ARRL and I are not going to "fix" them.

As far as elmering and "assimilation" of newbies is concerned one of the first points I'd make to a newbie is to simply spin the big knob in the panel and go somewhere else when they run into a jerk. How difficult is that?? And by the way Carl the volume of misbehavior in the hobby today is no worse than it was a half century ago. Back when ham radio grew every year . . .

Take a look at the dictionary definition of "censor".
If the government were involved, it would definitely be censorship. But a group of ordinary citizens getting together and abiding by a set of rules probably doesn't meet the definition, IMO. The moderators of QRZ.COM sometimes delete a posting they find objectionable.
That's not censorship, that's just the golden rule -
The guys with the gold make the rules. :-)

Right now you could go for the Certificates of Code Proficiency that the ARRL sponsors. Check their web site for details. For this award you copy code off special broadcasts and receive a certificate for 1 minute solid copy. I believe for this award you do NOT have to be a member. I have the ones for 10 wpm and 15wpm.

Also they are investigating a program for earning such certificates with sending administered via live examiners at a session. This is just in the investigation stage.

I hope so. In the meantime, the ARRL already has such a program. Once a month they transmit code runs and if you copy 1 minute solid you can get a certificate. They start at 10wpm and go up. I've got the ones for 10 and

Yup, using it is the important part.

I think I just Roberta Flacked ya. My posts tell the story of you (and everyone inbred moron's) life. You can't stand the fact that what your daddy did to you is now public. You're further embarrassed by the fact that you actually like it. Personally I think you seduced him. People say don't blame the child but in your case I think it's okay to blame you.

You're mentally ill Loonel. It comes from you being inbred and all. I wouldn't necessary categorize you as a sex abuse survivor since you seduced your dad. Yeah your as$ bled and all but you ask for it and got it in spades. You didn't object when he did it over and over again.
Hence... you wanted it. Also walking around the house in your UnderRoos didn't help the situation.

I'm know the level of your retarded is quite severe. It's obvious. But somehow I don't feel bad picking on it. You're pitiful but you don't induce feelings of pity. You induce feels of mockery or laughter.
Laughing at you not with you. You deformities don't help your situation either. But again this is mostly due to your inbrededness. Those the rough sex that your parents and their friends had with you must have left physcial and emotional scares.

I am calling on the state board to return you to the mental facility from whence you escaped. You are obviously challenged and are not capable of making any decisions. You are not a functioning retard. You need close supervision, medical and plenty of counseling.

If it weren't you, I'd kind of feel sorry for the sap whose momma died by his hand, and whose father frequently engaged in homosexual acts with you. These acts extended to friends and close acquaintences.

If you want to kill yourself, feel free to. Life has ana1ly raped and sodomized you. No one will think any less of you if you did it. You've faced enough challenges and are now entitled to a bit of a break.

Whatever you choose, good luck. I think your mom might be happy to see you again. Enjoi!

Yep. Nobody has an innate right to post to a newsgroup. Nobody has a right to do or say anything he or she wants about an ISP either. Roger Wiseman found that out the hardway when he made his comments about a woman who runs a local ISP. His access was yanked in a heartbeat.

There are numerous other moderated newsgroups. None of them seem to have a problem because the socially handicapped are simply not permitted to post to them. One has no more right to post to those groups than a person has a right to appear on CNN to make a statement.

Anyone may go outside his house, stand on the walk and expound on his views for hours at a time. No one is forced to listen.

312. Loonel Forgives his father for his childhood sexual encouter with him. And now Lion'sAs$ is looking for love.

His name is Lionel. Some call him Loonel. Other call him Lion'sAs$ and yet the call him retard. I wouldn't call him that to his face but behind his back all bets are off.

He is a gay male that is medically obese but not morbidly obese. His hair is thinned quite a bit. He's mostly attracted to males. This is largely because of several sex episodes he experienced with his father (and some of his father's friend). Loonel was introduced to the world of gay sex but his father. His mother introduced him to heterosex.

Fortunately for them Loonel's parents did not have any more kids (that they would have assuredly sexual abused). Loonel was a love starved child and was eager to please those around him. That is problem why he didn't complain when his father and some family friends gave Loonel his first instruction on the proper techniques for giving oral sex. Loonel was always the one performing the oral sex.

Loonel was later introduced to gay bunghole sex. At first he didn;t like it but like a fungus, it eventually grew on him. Loonel is a bit ashamed of being gay and claims to have a girlfriend.

We here at AUK should work to encourage Lionel to come out of the closet and accept his true homosexual nature. Loonel also feels attraction towards animals but for a long while he was able to surpress these feelings

For the moment he's merely bisexual with trisexual tendencies.

Please help Loonel out by being supportive of his gayness. And ignore the fact that his parents diddled him. If he doesn't bring it up, DO NOT TALK about this.

Encourage Loonel not to have sex with minor or animals. And women ask about his sexuality. You don't want feces from some anonymous gay partner he hooked up with in some public restroom entering your internal organ (the vagina). Loonel will not offer this info. It has to asked.

Good Luck Lion'sAs$ in your quest for love. Try not to think about your childhood too much.

Does that mean Snarky can't let Porchmonkey suck his dick anymore????

I mean, after all, Porchy seems to enjoy it so much and it DOES seem to make him feel better. He certainly is proud of it. :/

Although our approach will of necessity have to be different, we still must face the equivalent of market saturation. Not everyone is going to be interested in amateur radio no matter what we do and on top of that our general population growth is very slow. These issues must be considered when devising a strategy. Look at how many people believed and still believe that Morse code kept people out. They think there is a huge number of people just waiting in the wings chomping at the bit to become hams without having to take a code test. I'll certainly be happy and excited if that happens but let's say it doesn't (and I think it won't). What then will people propose? Will they continue to ignore concepts like market saturation as one potentially relevant issue? Will they continue to ignore the concept that not everyone is interested in the types of things that amateur radio can do?

We've probably got another several years until the "cell phone substitute" hams are, for the most part, gone. That's several years still of decline. With the relatively low cost of cell phones these days, we will get no more recruits from this approach although we have kept a few that came in this way.

The decline in CB enthusiasts is also reducing another potential source of recruits.

This actually leads to the major reason for my little guessing game on the growth of amateur radio without a code test. If my prediction is wrong and we have a huge growth, I'll be happy and readily admit that I was wrong. If the growth doesn't happen, perhaps people will wake up and realize that changing requirements won't address the issue. Perhaps they will realize that it is a recruitment and marketing issue rather than requirements.

F8ck you b1tch and f*ck that dead c*nt you call momma. I'm glad your Well, yes and no.

To use the toaster analogy, there's no growth in toaster sales because almost everyone who wants or needs a toaster already has one or more. The percentage of Americans who want toasting technology in their homes is very large, too.

New toaster sales today are almost all either replacements for worn-out old toasters, or to people setting up a new kitchen.

The key point is that there aren't large numbers of people out there who don't know about toasters and who will step up and buy one or more if modern toasting is presented to them in a positive way.

But with amateur radio, I think there are sizable numbers of people who don't even know amateur radio exists, or who have very distorted ideas about it. Those are the people we need to reach.

Of course many of them won't be interested, no matter what the license requirements are, because "radio for its own sake" just doesn't interest as many people as, say, whole wheat toast with butter and marmalade.

> Not everyone is going to be > interested in amateur radio no matter what we do and on top of that our

I think the population growth is particularly slow in the demographics that would be most interested in becoming hams, too.

All that means is that we need to get the word out.

Exactly.

If that were really true, the number of US hams by license class would be as lopsided as it is in Japan. But it's not.

> I'll certainly be happy and excited if

Me too!

Reducing the written tests, of course. In fact, that's already been proposed by NCVEC (see their "Communicator" license idea, and the paper "Amateur Radio in the 21st Century").

We will see in the next few months.

But remember that the resturcturing of 2000 did not result in longterm growth.

Yup.

Another factor is that many of the new hams of the 70s-'80s-'90s were not young people when they started out. More than a few I know were empty-nesters and retirees - and now they aren't with us anymore.

Also, it should be remembered that back in the supposed "golden age" of amateur radio - whenever that supposedly was - there were not only far fewer hams than today, but the number of hams per 1000 people was far lower. Only in the past few years has the US population grown faster than the US amateur population.

> This actually leads to the major reason for my little guessing game on the Same here. That's one reason I will continue to post the ARS license numbers here twice a month. That way, anyone can go back through the archives and see the long-term trends.

>If
> the growth doesn't happen, perhaps people will wake up and realize that

I agree!

But mark my words: there will be loud cries that the written tests need to be reduced as well.

Some of them work for the Madisonville Independent School District here in Texas. Their web filters block anything related to amateur radio as "entertainment".
When I try to access www.arrl.org, I get a message saying it is blocked because it is "entertainment".
A school system that blocks anything associated with amateur radio is in very sad shape.

MaxWhore go gag on a lama c0ck you filthy nasty dollar menu order b1tch with a toxic stank nasty diseased ridden pus$y!

Douche, b1tch, douche Does your pus$y have 666 inscribed on it? Perhaps as a birthmark. I think your demonic pus$y is life threatening to everyone on earth. If I look in the bible I'll find a prophecy about you and your toxic netherparts.

Get over your douche-a-phobia b1tch. Douche now! Or Forever hold your Yeast

Her fear of Summer's Eve makes her a Summer's Evil b1tch

A douche in time saves nine, b1tch!!!! Heed these words MaxC*nt!!! ;-P Douche, b1tch, douche... MaxWhore, Your pu$sy is toxic and that's "an inconvenient truth!" ;-P
"I love all types of d1ck and pus$y. All I need is a dime and a d1ck."
-- You have admitted your true nature, MaxWhore, in Message ID:
<010220071006386557%maxthean...@gmail.com>

And git back to suck off those homeless men, the horses can wait, b1tch! ;-P

They d1cks are drying up and it's your job to slob their knobs, b1tch.
Dimes are free, b1tch. Earn your dimes, dollar menu, b1tch

Remember, MaxWhore, why douche tomorrow what you can douche today, b1tch? Heed this words filthy whore!!

Chuck Lysaght: Tarred & Feathered!

VOTE! Usenet Kook Awards, January 2007
MID: <Xns98CAEEA8929Fpinkusenseinetcabalc@204.153.244.170>

"Fredbot == SameAsB4 == TGOOS

"You are stalking me, even after I thrashed ya." -- PorchMonkey4Life, a veritable combination of Sherlock Holmes and Doc Savage for the 21st Century. No, really. Would I lie? MID: <zaUqh.2972$E35.415@trnddc02>

"He unleashes a fecal explosion he time he posts. He uses so many nyms because he gets beaten so easily and so convincingly in flame wars and tries to hide behind nyms in the hopes of getting a fresh start. To bad for him that his lameness keep shining through like a beacon for all tards (e.g., SameAs$B4, Demon Spawn, Barbara's Pus$y, FredBot, TGOOS, ..., etc)" -- Monkey-man identifies <jitter> as me, among others, in broken English, in MID: <Z_Xqh.3167$E35.215@trnddc02>

"Q: What do you call someone in the White House who is honest, caring, and well-read?
A: A tourist." -- Anonymous

"It would be offly hard for any of you to abuse me on usenet. Really. I have the advantage. I could easily turn alt.usenet.kooks into a cesspool of encoded posts. Bringing the noise ratio up so high as to make the group worthless. Anybody who can code could do this, why nobody has bothered before now is beyond me. The ultimate spamming engine.. 'BAWAHAHA'" -- Dustbin "Outer Filth" K00k's delusions of grandeur reached new heights, in Message-ID: <Xns98355D29419B9HHI2948AJD832@69.28.186.121>
"Immorality: The morality of those who are having a better time." -- H. L. Mencken

"Consider that language a moment. 'Purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States' is in the eye of the beholder, and this administration has proven itself to be astonishingly impatient with criticism of any kind. The broad powers given to Bush by this legislation allow him to capture, indefinitely detain, and refuse a hearing to any American citizen who speaks out against Iraq or any other part of the so-called 'War on Terror.'

"If you write a letter to the editor attacking Bush, you could be deemed as purposefully and materially supporting hostilities against the United States. If you organize or join a public demonstration against Iraq, or against the administration, the same designation could befall you. One dark-comedy aspect of the legislation is that senators or House members who publicly disagree with Bush, criticize him, or organize investigations into his dealings could be placed under the same designation. In effect, Congress just gave Bush the power to lock them up." -- William Rivers Pitt

"It has become clear in recent months that a critical mass of the American people have seen through the lies of the Bush administration; with the president's polls at an historic low, growing resistance to the war Iraq, and the Democrats likely to take back the Congress in mid-term elections, the Bush administration is on the ropes. And so it is particularly worrying that President Bush has seen fit, at this juncture to, in effect, declare himself dictator." -- Frank Morales
http://www.uruknet.biz/?p=m27769&hd=0&size=1&l=e&fark

"No man in History, including JESUS CHRIST, has directly revealed to the World the SATANIC WEAPON used to enslave mankind -- INTELLECTUAL THOUGHT!!" -- Ray Karczewski repeatedly proves his words in every post he makes

Cecil, amateur radio is a national SERVICE!

Would you call the military "entertainment?"

Connect the dots.

Some dashes might be nice, too...

Yea, sorry I didn't make that clear... In a true emergency you would be "legal".. But how I define a true emergency and how the FCC does may be different and I don't intend to argue the point with them unless it's really clear cut. (and I don't have a working cell phone on my person at the time.)

Personally, I'd expect to get better results on 2 Meters than expecting somebody on the MURS service to help. I'd also expect that if you are in a location where nobody is listening to the repeaters, nobody is going to be hearing you on MURS bands either. I just don't see the purpose in doing the modification myself.

A more useful way to deal with this is to add more ham bands to your mobile capabilities. 10 Meters, 6 Meters and 440 are all good mobile options. That and a recent copy of the Repeater Directory will get you more help in almost all cases I can think of.

There we have to agree to disagree. I think that ham radio would be beneficial to all of the groups that I mentioned. However, no one is presenting the information to them so they don't think about it.

Advertising would better be handled by an organization. I was thinking about articles in the magazine. If the writer can't find a "tie in" then it is apparent that you are looking at the wrong demographic and need to find a media outlet that caters to another demographic.

Then you have been talking to a very demographic from me. The ones

Granted some of them are higher class licenses now. The CB stigma would be hard to overcome though.

If the market is saturated at current levels, then we should face the fact that ham radio is obsolete and as quaint as horse buggies. I'm only using the manufacturing analogy because you did. Personally, I see ham radio as a service and not a product. I see a lot of households who don't have one and they don't have one because they don't see a need for it that can't be met someway else.

Then you are marketing to what is pretty much a closed set. Don't get me wrong, there is nothing wrong with that and it's what I would guess most hams are doing. They are relying on organizations such as the AARL to market for new members and the AARL isn't doing it. Hence, what are already low numbers continue to drop.

Saturation does not equate to being obsolete. The market (toasters, TVs, etc) for almost all current consumer goods has been saturated for decades.
The consumer buys for one of three reasons: 1) A person setting up their own household for the first time; 2) The old one broke; 3) They just want a new one.

The toaster market (a saturated market) stays pretty steady year after year for the three reason listed. It does not grow (at least here in the US).

What I am saying with the marketing analogy is that there is an inherent limit on the percentage of people that will be interested in ham radio. We are probably close to that limit. Yes we can and will find prospective hams by active recruiting. However, given it's limited appeal, finding those people will merely enable us to maintain stability.

Actually, looking at other countries with well off populations, I would suspect that we may drop from our current approximately 2 hams per thousand people down to more like 1 ham per thousand people before we finally stabilize. And we'll have to recruit diligently to stabilize even there.

These are the numbers of current, unexpired FCC-issued amateur radio licenses held by individuals on the stated dates, and the percentage of the total number of active licenses that class contains:

As of May 14, 2000:

Novice - 49,329 (7.3%)
Technician - 205,394 (30.4%)
Technician Plus - 128,860 (19.1%)
General - 112,677 (16.7%)
Advanced - 99,782 (14.8%)
Extra - 78,750 (11.7%)

Total Tech/TechPlus - 334,254 (49.5%)

Total General/Advanced/Extra - 291,209 (43.2%)

Total all classes - 674,792

As of February 1, 2007:

Novice - 23,298 (3.6%) [decrease of 26,031]
Technician - 291,992 (44.5%) [increase of 86,598]
Technician Plus - 31,728 (4.8%) [decrease of 97,132]
General - 130,671 (19.9%) [increase of 17,994]
Advanced - 69,441 (10.6%) [decrease of 30,341]
Extra - 108,389 (16.5%) [increase of 29,639]

(percentages may not add up to exactly 100.0% due to rounding)

Total Tech/TechPlus - 323,720 (49.4%) [decrease of 10,534]

Total General/Advanced/Extra - 308,501 (47.1%) [increase of 17,292]

Total all classes - 655,519 (decrease of 19,273)

Note that these totals do not include licenses that have expired but are in the grace period.

They also do not include club, military or other station-only licenses.

Note also that effective April 15, 2000, new Novice, Technician Plus and Advanced licenses are no longer issued.

Since April 15, 2000, FCC has renewed all existing Technician Plus licenses as Technician. By May of 2010, the number of Technician Plus licenses should drop to zero, because all of them will have been renewed as Technician or allowed to expire. It is therefore informative to consider the totals of the two classes, since the Technician class includes a significant number of Technician Plus licenses renewed as Technician.

Any technology is at the mercy of technological improvement. I think that we are using one of ham radio's biggest competitors right now.
The only advantage of ham radio over the Internet is mobility and price. Otherwise, anything you could imagine doing via radio can be done here either via newsgroups or IRC.

However, that too is something better left to another thread.

Our numbers per population are the second highest in the world so the "already low numbers" is a fallacy. Only Japan has a higher percentage and it is difficult to determine the validity of their numbers since they license many people for life in grade school, many of whom are never active.
Comparing it to parts of Europe, they have 1 ham per thousand where we have 2 hams per thousand.

The grass roots approach could possibly be the most effective. I know hunters, truckers, fishermen, farmers, etc. All of them know additional people that I don't If I recruit two ACTIVE people, and they in turn recruit two more each and so on, we would have explosive growth in amateur radio. Remember tsunamis are generally initiated by a single event in a single location.

Actually I don't view the ARRL as being responsible for marketing ham radio and recruiting new people. I view them as a service to their members type of thing. However it might not be a bad idea to suggest to them that they set up a donation fund for placing ads in non ham magazines.

Well, the idea for emergencies is not so much the MURS as the police frequencies. Thanks for your opinion.

Since I think that the percentage is much higher, I guess we will have to agree to disagree. However, be warned that even if you are right, I'll probably still think that it was the result of a self fulfilling prophecy by the ham community at large.

Take care Dee. If we don't suffer another setback, my wife will be coming home from the hospital within a week or so. When she does, taking care of her and letting her know that I love her is gong to be my main priority until she once again achieves independence. It's going to be a 24/7 job for awhile.

I'm saying that so that, when I disappear, people don't think that I got mad and took my bag of marbles home. It's just a matter of priorities.

This is why I believe the way to "save" ham radio is "quality over quantity".

You cannot "save" ham radio by throwing more bodies at it. You can only save ham radio by making it such an essential service that the FCC dare not eliminate it.

You and I both. Did you post your prediction for the "pool" (as to where ARS licensing numbers will be in another year? I said -1 to 0% change.

While I'm sure there are some people who will get licensed now there is no code test, I do not think it will result in any meaningful numbers added to the service. I suspect what you will see are a rash of upgrades as Techs obtain HF privs. I wouldn't be surprised if, for the first time in many years, we actually saw a decrease in the number of licensed Techs (which, at the moment, is the only growing license class sans the Extra class)

> What then will people propose?

Why... its those NASTY, pesky THEORY examinations that are holding people away, naturally. After all, if all you want to do is talk to your buddy 2 streets over on the local repeater, why do you need to know stupid things like radio wave propagation and antenna theory. All I do is call HRO, and my antenna theory arrives pre-manufacturered in a box. Maybe rather than having tests on RLC circuits we can have tests on the proper way to tighten hose clamps.

I think you'll bottom out in the mid 300k's and stay there.... Or, the rate of decline will fall off rapidly but still continue, slowly, as the ARS peters out into non-existance by the mid 2020's.

> The decline in CB enthusiasts is also reducing another potential source of "Radio" simply isn't 'sexy' these days, with the internet, etc. Radio-based "hobbies" are, for the most part, D-E-A-D.

We need another "Smokey and the Bandit" movie to glamourize CB/Ham radio again.

Perhaps the ARRL should work with Yaesu, Kenwood, Cushcraft, etc. to arrange for interested college clubs around the country to get free gear to set up a station. Who knows.

with all due respect more visble is what I find we need most alot of folks esp an interest when they see us here Feild isn't a bad draw in past my own efforts there and other places have hit the snag of closing the deal by mentioninfg code (just getting the phrase out let adding the word testing)

Explain the situation if I were to be reading the group, then reply to the group, and the "Moderator" decides that I strayed a bit too far off topic. No postee. Are those folk going to see my post made in earnest to anothers post? The exact thing happened to ich Clark from the rraa group. Call it what you will. Newspeak is all the rage.

I filter based on content, not whether or not I agree with the wondered what kind of filthy things I was involved in. If someone is going to post abberant stuff, they go into the bozo bin. As well as people who feel compelled to post hundreds of unreadable messages a day.

I've seen it in action, Len. I belong to one moderated group to get schedules of events. If a disagreeing post makes it onto the board, the "moderator" clamps down and people are wanred on to post any more disagreeing posts.

The newsgroup is like watching Teletubbies. All nice and cozy, with people saying "I like that", and others saying "yea, I like that too, isn't it wonderful? Yes, it's really wonderful. Isn't ot great that it's wonderful?"

Ick.

I think the latter would be an excellent idea. I would vounteer to "VE" such as session. Also, aren't there certain FCC licenses that require 20 wpm testing (like Radiotelegraph)? Not sure if this license class is obsolete...

One thing that I would like but many people on the ng would disagree with: A certain vanity callsign format reserved only for amateurs who posses such a certificate.

Not really. I was advanced, thus proving 13 wpm, and I upgraded to extra last year to a 5 wpm call sign. All you need to do is keep your old call sign if you want to prove you passed a higher speed. I would like to see a special format of vanity call signs that require you to have an ARRL certificate of proficiency for 20 wpm, which is quite a good achievement. Like all vanity signs, you would have to pay and it would not give you any special priviledges. It might be useful for reciprocal licenses in certain countries like China (pop. 1.2 billion) that still require code.

Might help!

Thing one - there never will be a huge number of hams.

Thing two - I've seen firsthand the damage that the grouchy olde tymers can do. They chase people away. Old timers with an attitude are now the greatest danger to Ham radio.

Putting together a station is fun.

Talking around the world without a structure is fun.

Learning about all that Radio encompasses is fun.

Talking with friends old and new about radio is fun

Fun, fun, fun, fun for everyone!

Listening to someone bemoan CB'ers, nickle extras, and how their prowess in CW makes them superior, how Hams really had it hard in the old days, any idiot can become a ham nowadays, next thing yaknow, they will be giving licenses away on boxes of cereal type hams, and onandon is not fun.

That type would be helping the ARS best by turning in their license. Or at least having the decency to keep their hate to themselves.

Very good question. In future centuries it may become very popular again in some form if we ever colonize planets or moons in our solar system. However, not being there yet, I sure would like to improve our situation on this planet, especially during sunspot minima. It would REALLY be helpful if we could have a full 40m band that is free of commerical broadcasting interference...that would be a significant improvement.

Also, the ability to communicate on a full 60 m band at full power would help.

A decent chunk of 30m with voice would be very helpful.

Much of the segments I mentioned are not used that much anymore by the commericals and it is going to waste.

75-80m and 160m are great at certain times except that, although they tend to favor the rural demographic, they are uselss to the younger people who tend to live in the cities and suburbs.

I think the spectrum provided to us is basically unusable much of the time (with the exception of 20m).

We are told to use the bands or lose them but much of what we have cannot be used, reliably, much of the time.

That's not right, Mike. I can write letters to the editors of all the magazines I want. None of them is obliged to print my letters. I can stand up in the middle of a movie theater and espouse some political opinion. I'll be escorted out. I can attempt to heckle some politician during a speech. I'll be shown the door.

There are venues where you have a right to speak and venues where you don't have a right to be heard.

Enforced? It's a free country. If 3 certified VE's want to get together and attest that candidates passed a certain Morse test, giving it the same credibility as an ARRL administerd FCC VE session, why not? There's no law against that. The VE's could even charge if they wanted (I would do it for free).

It depends.

Some years ago, I went to a hamfest/convention, and there were some ARRL bigwigs in the room. Must have been the early 90s.

There had been suggestions that amateur radio didn't have the general exposure it should have had. There are huge county fairs, state fairs, and how often do you see amateur radio shown and demonstrated there?

Indeed, the Smithsonian Institution had a station = NN3SI, that was on public display and in daily operation, and it disappeared!!!

So finally one of the senior citizens running the event said "We put up an amateur station at (a major fair)".

I'm thinking --- GREAT!

"And we held demonstrations for the youngsters - like the 4-H group."

GREAT AGAIN!

"And we had a message fair!"

Groan.

The ARRL guy reads some text from a parent to his kid at home "and if you don't do your homework, you're grounded.", grasping a wrinkled "radiogram".

I asked a question. When I asked it, I thought the guy was gonna die.

"Well, I can understand, that a message fair may be of interest to you, and may have gotten you interested in this. But in this day of cheap long-distance and international telephone calling, and now we're in the cellular age, and online computer chatting, do you really think this is going to turn kids' heads? I mean, a MESSAGE FAIR???"

He didn't know how to answer. He stumbled. Then he said , "well we weren't really trying to convince the kids to join up" or something like that.

A noted media personality was in the audience and suggested that ham radio be tied into technologies that kids understand -- like, for instance, satellite tracking and communication. Show the horizon tracking and when the satellite gets to this point here, you're gonna hear voices on the radio. Fuse computer technology with ham radio technology and you'll turn the kids heads.

How do you attract the new folks? Kids, adults, whatever?

Forget about what turned you on to amateur radio 20, 30, 50 , 60 years ago. Try to think of something that will turn the kids' heads today, if you can.

Morse code won't do it. Neither will 2 meter hand helds, not in the era of cellular technology. Packet? Who needs it, we got e-mail.

Experimentation? Maybe! SOMETHING ... I'm surprised amateur television hasn't jumped up. ATV via balloon? Satellite signals? But clear your head of message fairs, or technology that got you buzzed in 1955.

Don't blame the audience if they're not interested in code. Don't blame society. They want to know -- what FUN can they have?

You declare the official VE FCC test session closed. Then open a new ARRL CW proficiency exam session. No problems there.

The ARRL can have their own official CW test. Also, after the Bush administration privatizes the FCC, ARRL will most likely control the Part 97 amateur land mobile section anyway :-)) (think about it, kb9rqz ...maybe the CW proficiency certificate will get you some extra priviledges someday heh heh).

I told your about her toxic pus$y and the need for teflon. I hope you don't get hurt. It is important that you make her douche thoroughly. Her pus$y is depleting the ozone layer.

Hi Dave,

There certainly are. But we're not talking about a person in a movie theatre. I'd much prefer to make the decision on whether or not I will see someone's posts than have someone else make that decision for me. And there lies the major problem. Those strange folk that live near you are an obvious censor target, as well as those folk who were posting a gazillion flames to each other the last year or so. But what about the moderator who simply doesn't like another person. As an example, Cecil and Len are in some people's killfiles. But I enjoy both of them very much. I would assume that anyone who would put Len in a killfile would also censor his posts. Those "anyones" could be moderators. And Cecil is an enjoyable person to spar with on occasion, as well as a source of knowledge.

Heck, I just looked at my bozo bin, and I have a couple hundred people in there at least. I'm a censoring junkie. One weird post about what some guy wants to do to another guy earns a permanent trip to the bin.

But I'm deciding what shows up on my screen. Others may want other people to decide what they see or don't see. Sheeple.

Hence my stance that there is a sizable number of people who beleive that free speech is a nuisance.

Honestly, what would you do if you didn't have Len to fight with? I suspect you would get bored and eventually stop posting.

You do know that one definition of insanity is when you keep doing the same

Yup. I've said many times that the greatest harm came not from the debates but the outright hatred and lies that some in both groups perpetuated.

What does amateur radio not offer now that it once did?

It seems to me that amateur radio today offers even more than it did when I first got started 40 years ago.

For example, in 1967:

- Almost all HF/MF amateur operation was CW, SSB voice, or AM voice. There was some SSTV and 45.45 baud Baudot RTTY, but those modes required a considerable amount of additional equipment that was bulky, complex, and expensive.

- Almost all VHF/UHF amateur operation was AM voice or CW. There was some SSB voice, some FM voice, some RC, some RTTY and some ATV. RTTY and ATV required a considerable amount of additional equipment that was bulky, complex, and expensive. There were only a few repeaters on the amateur bands, and amateur satellite communications was only a few years old (OSCAR 1 was launched in 1961).

- 30, 17 and 12 meters weren't ham bands. 160 was full of LORAN, and amateur use of 160 was severely restricted.

- Adjusted for inflation, most new ham gear was much more expensive then than it is now. Look up the price of, say, a Swan 350 and power supply, or a Drake 4 line, and then adjust the prices for inflation.

- Computers had almost no presence in amateur radio. A few people with connections, usually at universities, did neat things like very early forms of computer logging and circuit simulation, but that was the exception.

- Most not-in-person communication between amateurs was by the ham bands, the telephone, the US mail and publications. There were no websites full of free-for-the-download information, no eBay or online sellers, no email, etc. Elmering was limited to the hams in your area, the ones you could find on the air, and possibly a few by-mail.

- The only permitted digital mode was 45.45 baud RTTY using the 5 level Baudot code. It would be a decade more before any other digital modes were allowed for US hams.

The list goes on and on. Many of the things that are commonplace in amateur radio today were far in the future back then. Many other things in amateur radio were far more expensive and difficult in those days than they are today.

It seems to me that a ham today can do almost everything that a ham could do in 1967.

> What can we > do to make it more attractive?

I think the major thing to do is to simply portray all the things amateurs are doing - today, in 2007 - to as wide an audience as possible. Then let people decide what they are interested in.

For example, don't assume that today's young people will only be interested in how to use a computer with a radio, or that older folks aren't going to be interested in new technology.

Just show the "Ham's Wide World" of 2007, and let the folks who are interested decide what they like about it.

Not at the same point in "space/time"?

I propose that the tests could be adminsitered in parallel provided that a wormhole was constructed between FCC applicants and ARRL CW applicants.

The VEC can do whatever it wants. Look at W5YI VEC. They administer all sorts of non-Amateur radio exams.

no it can not

or I can tell you that NoCode licnses would be issued NOW by the dozens
if not hunderds

the VECS acting as VEC can only adminster FCC tests and prefrom function related to that task

in 21 days Code testing of any kinds will leave that domain

Use teflon conditions. maxWhore's stank toxic pus$y discharge will disintegrate steel so your python needs protection from her and her disease-ridden pus$y.

Well put. A message fair is about as exciting as watching the trucks unload at the grocery store.

First we need to evaluate what amateur radio is. It's a hobby/service that is aimed at more or less technically inclined people.
It is not Kewl. It is very cool though. It is a chance to send signals agross the world without the aid of wires or infrastructure. You can build antennas, build radios, write software, communicate via voice, keyboard or OOK Morse. You can contest, you can contact as many countries and make friends all over the world. You can explore a lifetime worth of activity.

It is not much of an an activity for children anymore, although the young can take part in it. But times have changed. Not as much equipment is easily bought or built by the young'uns, and club activities are usually not set up for a mix of adults and youngsters. The demographic of new hams is similar to other technical hobbies such as Amateur astronomy, in that as a person gains more free time after the children are in college, they pursue interests that they have put off. This puts the new Ham in the 40's or older. My own experience and what I have seen since I became a ham bears this out. Age is not important. Enthusiasm is.

The technical aspect of it will sell at a fairly low level until the chinese put a man on the moon, then the politico's will scream about how the US is being eclipsed technically, and we start having sputnik flashbacks. then parents may encourage their children to look at technical pursuits.

I agree that the ATV ballooning aspect is a good approach for generating interest. I was heading up a ballooning effort when other ARS related activities made it take a back seat. But it has the potential for some really interesting work that amateurs can participate in.

Emergency Ops? I fear that in the post Katrina world, Amateur radio emergency operations will become bastardized into people who will undergo background investigations so that they can unload trucks, take out the trash and serve coffee to the professionals. At one point I was interested in EO, but seeing the recent "how amateur radio has to change" articles that espouse the above, I'll pass. I'm pretty certain that emergency ops will eventually be handled by professionals who get amateur radio licenses. Remember that the ARS got high marks during the Katrina debacle. The pros won't forget that. No good deed goes unpunished.

And is it legal for a licensed amateur to violate rules of a sovereign country (no matter how well-intentioned?

From W5YI amateur news:
RADIO AMATEUR INSTALLS RADIO TRANSMITTER FOR BURMA REBELS - The San Luis Obispo (Calif.) Tribune carried an interesting story on January 26 about David Martin, WA6TYJ of Paso Robles, CA. Martin, 60, also holds an amateur radio license (unofficial prefix 1Z9) issued by the Karen National Union (KNU.) That's the rebel government in a disputed region in Myanmar, the Asian country we used to call Burma. (The U.S. does not recognize the renaming of Burma to Myanmar.) "What he does is install and improve radio stations for Christian organizations." More than one-third of the KNU are Christians.

"He entered Myanmar last February without permission from its official government from neighboring Thailand by crossing a river in a wooden boat powered by an outboard motor. The part of Myanmar he entered is a disputed territory known as Karen State. ... It's the longtime home of an ethnic population of about 3 million known as the Karen people. ...Mr. Martin and his partner installed an FM radio transmitter and delivered 1,000 little solar-powered radio receivers that are tuned exclusively to that transmitter's frequency."

"They also set up an e-mail system that connects to the Internet via shortwave radio. It operates on solar and battery power. Mr. Martin said it can be a source of news and photos from Myanmar, where most other reports are censored by the military government."

The Internet and free international email are generally not accessible in Burma. The Karen National Liberation Army has waged the longest fight for independence in the world ...60 years (since 1947).

I tried calling 911 once, but couldn't find the 11 key.

In some situations, yes. But in most situations, those other services are preferred - if the only consideration is getting the communications done.

For example, there was a time when auto-in-trouble (including accident) calls to 911 were commonly done via amateur radio autopatch.
Today most of that is done by cell phones.

"Inferior services"? I say they are different, not inferior.

I think it's important to understand what we are actually trying to "sell". Selling amateur radio as a personal-communications solution isn't a good idea, IMHO.

It's the main selling point, IMHO, and we need to always keep it in mind.

There are lots more. The invention of photography did not eliminate drawing, sketching and painting. The invention of the motorcycle did not eliminate the bicycle. Many homes still have fireplaces even though they have modern, efficient heating systems.

Yes and no.

The invention of fiberglass did not eliminate wooden sailboats.

> I think > that we are using one of ham radio's biggest competitors right now.

The internet is only a competitor if you don't consider radio to be an end in itself.

> The only advantage of ham radio over the Internet is mobility and

I disagree!

An internet-capable computer can be had for almost no cost. The computer I am writing this on is a Dell Dimension XPS R400 - which cost me nothing but the time to set it up and add a few pieces (CD burner, soundcard) from other old computers. AOL with DSL costs less than POTS.

That kinda eliminates price as an issue.

Mobility is served in most cases by a cell phone.

What amateur radio offers that the 'net and telephone don't is a completely unique experience, and freedom from dependence on a commercial infrastructure. That's not going to change with technology.

> However, that too is something better left to another thread.

Or this one.

Good luck with your family's health issues. I hope they are quickly resolved in a good way.

Element one is gone. The hams who fought code elimination for so many years, many with unbridled hatred for uncoded hams, or even nickle Extras such as myself now are at a crossroads. They can either accept the change for what it is, or become like little neutron stars, perhaps embracing their hatred, perhaps clanning together to reminisce about the good old days when hems were really hams. Perhaps not much consolation however in the fact that they will have become irrelevant.

My experience leads me to suspect that most will choose the latter.
Too bad, that.

The new paradigm IMO should be that hams should now be expected to advance their technical skills and knowledge. The days when a Ham's worth was measured by motor skills and auditory processing ability are gone.

I'm planning on moving on and am excited by the new potential.

What are you going to do?

In three weeks, yes.

Do you think I am one of those you describe, Mike?

Have you ever seen me display hatred for any amateur radio operator who follows the rules?

There's nothing wrong with opposing a change that one thinks is not a good idea. Of course there are good ways and bad ways of opposing a change.

Why should any radio amateur be irrelevant?

That works both ways.

That's not a new paradigm at all. It's as old as amateur radio itself.
In fact, it's a very old, traditional paradigm.

Basically it says that amateur radio operators are not simply users of radio appliances. IMHO.

> The days when a Ham's

Operating skills are still a major part of amateur radio - and what hams should have and continue to develop. Whether or not they are tested doesn't mean those skills are no longer relevant.

Promote amateur radio - help other hams and wouldbe hams - enjoy building, fixing, operating, teaching, and learning.

IOW, the same stuff I've been doing in amateur radio for almost 40 years.

No new paradigm at all.

I've been in that situation too, Cecil, and a lot more recently than the 1950s.

And yes, if it were to happen today, my first reaction would be 911 on the cell phone. Only if that didn't work would I consider ham radio.

But consider this:

How many hams got their license so they could be the first on the scene with mobile emergency communications, compared with those who got their license because they thought "radio for its own sake" is fun?

Kudos to you for wanting to do so. ARRL's station W1AW sends Morse practice daily. There's a monthly "Qualifying Run" that you can copy, send your results to ARRL, and (if 100% correct for >= 1 minute) receive a certificate in return. If you have difficulty hearing W1AW from CT and you're on the "left coast", you may be able to hear K6YR better (Qualifying Runs only). There are also sound files online for practice. Details are here: http://www.arrl.org/w1aw.html

Stephan suggested that VEs could additionally offer optional Morse certification at license testing sessions. What a great idea -- especially for those w/o the capability to receive the transmissions! ARRL, are you listening?

That's fine, Mike. If you'd like to continue to post here, you may continue to do so. I have no doubt that you'd be able to post anything you've posted in the past to the moderated group.

What about him or her? Are you saying that you believe that the moderators would be likely to not pass through a post base upon not liking someone?

> As an example, Cecil > and Len are in some people's killfiles.

Okay. I certainly understand why one of them might be. Mark is in my killfile.

> But I enjoy both of them very

I'm not following your logic. I think it is likely that many of Len's posts wouldn't make it in the moderated group--not because of who he is, but because he can't control himself.

> Those "anyones" could be moderators. And Cecil is Cecil is going to be one of the moderators. You think the other moderators are going to stop his posts?

That's not easy. Some of these guys change their posting names all of the time. Even Mark has oodles of names he posts under.

> But I'm deciding what shows up on my screen. Others may want other > people to decide what they see or don't see. Sheeple.

Post here. You can make all of the decisions you like. I don't know why you feel that you have to limit yourself to the moderated group.

> Hence my stance that there is a sizable number of people who > beleive that free speech is a nuisance.

You can find all sorts of free speech on this and other newsgroups. Look at what some people choose to do with their right of free speech. I can go to all sorts of places where I limit my right of free speech--the theater I wrote of, a courtroom, a church, a school, a public ceremony. There are also situations where someone's right of free speech infringes my rights.

> Honestly, what would you do if you didn't have Len to fight with? I > suspect you would get bored and eventually stop posting.

If and when the moderated group comes into play, I doubt you'll see me post here. According to Len, his time here is coming to an end anyway. I don't need Leonard Anderson to make me complete.

My steel erectile is melting....thank goodness she likes to give head in the toilet. Talk about steam! Now how do I get her off of me? That beard is really irritating my balls.

"Consider that language a moment. 'Purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States' is in the eye of the beholder, and this administration has proven itself to be astonishingly impatient with criticism of any kind. The broad powers given to Bush by this legislation allow him to capture, indefinitely detain, and refuse a hearing to any American citizen who speaks out against Iraq or any other part of the so-called 'War on Terror.'

"If you write a letter to the editor attacking Bush, you could be deemed as purposefully and materially supporting hostilities against the United States. If you organize or join a public demonstration against Iraq, or against the administration, the same designation could befall you. One dark-comedy aspect of the legislation is that senators or House members who publicly disagree with Bush, criticize him, or organize investigations into his dealings could be placed under the same designation. In effect, Congress just gave Bush the power to lock them up." -- William Rivers Pitt

"It has become clear in recent months that a critical mass of the American people have seen through the lies of the Bush administration; with the president's polls at an historic low, growing resistance to the war Iraq, and the Democrats likely to take back the Congress in mid-term elections, the Bush administration is on the ropes. And so it is particularly worrying that President Bush has seen fit, at this juncture to, in effect, declare himself dictator." -- Frank Morales

How do they suddenly become irrelevant, Mike? If they gone on with their lives, operate on the bands in the same manner they've operated for years, if they check into nets, chase DX, operate in contests--where does irrelevant become reality?

Please don't use the word "paradigm", Mike. It has bad ju-ju associated with it. We don't "market the migration", "enter into a bold new paradigm", "become proactive" or "think outside the box".

Hams have never ever been one dimensional, nor do all radio amateurs march in lock step. Most of the hams I've known in over four decades in amateur radio have more than one area of interest. Most pride themselves on the sum of their skills, not in only a single one.

Well you'll need a Scooby snack for that. Just toss the scooby snack away from you and maxWhore will run off and fetch it.

if you don't have Scooby Snack, see if there's a male horse nearby. The smell of horsec0ck always drives MaxWhore wild.

if no male horses are nearby then simply give her a dime and tell her to go order off the dollar menu at McDonalds.

I hope you used the teflon condom else your nether region will be burning like an eternal flame. And your STD count will go from Zero to 176. See your urologist anyway just to get a clean bill of health!

Dude, you are so brave.

The only person who "needs" Len is, Len himself.

Aside from his "down his nose" attitude, Len is a meaningless sidebar in these groups.

Hardly. Please do not put words in my mouth.

I fully support the right of folks like Mark Morgan to spew their excrement all they want.

However, I also realize that freedom of speech does not mean you are entitled to a free printing press provided by the government. Your freedom of speech does not mean I have to be forced to listen (or read) what you type.

Tell me Mike, 1) do you read each and every posting in this newsgroup?

2) Do you have a kill-file, or selectively choose to ignore postings from certain posters?

If you answered either No to #1 or Yes to #2, then by your definition you are practicing "censorship", aren't you?

Poor Mark. He likes to paint himself as the defender of free speech on these boards.

Problem is that there is no paint on his canvas.

Can you do any better? You could better spend your time coaxing Mark to avail himself of a spell check program instead of making excuses for him.
Mark has entered these newsgroups sounding, and typing, like an illiterate idiot. Dyslexia aside, Mark is a barely functional, self-proclaimed savant, and that is being generous. You should know better. At least YOU can be somewhat literate, though there are doubts about that, too.

I've yet to see anyone ever post any "proof" of this claim.

Personally, I've never encountered it on the air. I've never looked up the callsign of someone who has been licensed and made a decision not to communicate with them on the basis of their callsign. Neither has any other ham operator I'm aware of. In thousands of contacts I've had, and listened to, I've never heard someone shunned on their basis of their license class, or their lack of a morse code examination.

Oh, I'm sure there are some out there. I'm sure some ham operators out there still believe in Santa Claus too. There are probably a few Gay Pagan Dyslexic hams out there as well.

Should I characterize ham radio, or even "many" ham radio operators, on the basis of those claims?

No.

It's all just in your head. You created such a juicy life that you swim in your own cum. The pathetic fact is at the end of each day you couldn't come up enough useful gooes before you passed out with a tiny bath on the chest.

So Malscribe rejected your fagg0tity as$. Maybe it was because of the wide assortment of STDs that you have. Maybe it was because he's one hideous looking individual. Maybe it was because your fat and balding.
Maybe it was because you have extremely poor (or no) hygiene.

Don't be mad at the world just because you're a limp d1ck pathetic loser. Blame your equally retarded parents for having such $hitty DNA.
Now go trolling for c0ck elsewhere, ya desperate fag.

My ARRL Division is exploring bringing the "qualifying runs" to a local venue. I don't know if they will run them concurrently with License Exams, don't care. It will probably be a means for long time

If I'm not mistaken, the ARRL has offered similar certificates for years. Not locally, but via mail (i.e. you copy 1 minute of code at X WPM and you get a certificate from the League). Not sure if other organizations like FISTS do something similar or not.

I can't imagine for the life of me why you would have an issue with that. In a sense, it is little different than contesting... WAS, for instance.

Perhaps it is the choice of operating mode that offends you for some reason?

Would it be more to your liking if the ARRL had "FM competency certificates" where people had to copy a solid minute of a voice transmission and mail it in the to the League?

But were they primarily interested in being first on the scene with mobile emergency communications, for things like auto accidents?

Or were they primarily interested in emergency communications between fixed points, in situations where the normal communications infrastucture was unavailable?

what copyright would that be Mark? I see nothing on your "blog" other than the fact you invite comments. So what I read is that you only invite comments that you personally approve? Isn't that censorship? Isn't that the job of a moderator?? Isn't that what and a couple of others are all in a bother about?

A crime Gracie? Unfortunately the only crime I can see is the general lack of spelling and sentence structure on your part. But then again, I see that from several others as well

I was just curious as to why you seem to be up in arms about newsgroup censorship when you yourself is guilty of censorship as well

Oh well, I guess you can have you kayak and heat it too

I keep it in a 3 ring binder with my special events certificate myself. At the time that I took my 5wpm and 13wpm tests, I was dissatisfied with my copy even though I passed. For my personal satisfaction, I worked for the Code Proficiency Certificate and received one for 10wpm with an endorsement for 15wpm.

The latter. The point is that Intel probably doesn't rely on hams for emergency communications anymore.
I would guess they use commercial satellites now.

Oh? Was that when you served the country in your
"other ways?"

Or was that when you shot bears for naval intellgence?
No, that couldn't be you...was another who also served his country in "other ways."

Or maybe you were the military hero "in a country at war?" No, that was your buddie wearing the little red hat of a morse monkey, a former REMF who implies all those things without being specific.

You couldn't have been a "resident of Hawaii" scarfing up "club" calls for non-existant "radio clubs." No, that's another poster entirely, the captain of the "Hornblower" and the "Effluvia" motorboat (on that "three-hour tour").

So, how many DID get their hobby radio license "just for being an 'emergency communicator?'"

Aren't you the one with their pulse on the numbers and KNOWING what everyone's "intent and purpose" is?

Of course you are! C'mon out with the "real reasons."

Gotta love all those code-tested knowitalls. :-)

I just hope they don't send you a certificate.

From what I've read here, you might be the first rejected but not the most rejected.

I've never been very specific with you about my Vietnam service because I've seen the kind of things you have done to others. I've done no boasting about my service in Southeast Asia and have not gotten into specifics. I've never claimed any heroics nor have I described any artillery barrages.

You are the individual who made the now famous sphincter post about what it was like to undergo an artillery barrage, except that you were never in an artillery barrage. That ties in nicely with your posts over a ten year period here. You rant about getting into amateur radio but you've never gotten into amateur radio or even tried to do so.

Agree, except I just don't "filter." I've had long practice in skim-reading to "sort" out what MIGHT be worthwhile to read in more detail.

My wife and I have "his and her" computers here in the home office. We can see each others' screens just by turning to glance at them. We DO respect that each of us have different interests in addition to common ones. Heh heh, when I'm doing schematics using Paint, she kids me about "doing dirty pictures again." [they result in very clean schematics, really...:-)]

Riiiight, and "Foghorn Lenhorn" is perfectly acceptable in addition to "novice in radio" and other snarly epithets.
As long as one is a morse code enthusiast (nee' evangelist).

Mike, no sweat, know where you are coming from. Due to chronological age differences, I've been "seeing" that for a half-century-plus...IN radio and away from the 'Net, the BBSs, and all that computer-modem comms things. Computer comms weren't really widespread until around 1980 and my experience goes three decades before that.

Been there, done that, might have a garage sale to get rid of all those old T-shirts. :-)

heh heh heh heh heh heh heh heh...

Been a LONG time since I baby-sat kiddies watching Satiddy TV shows.
But, I CAN envision some purple dinosaurs doing what you describe.
Some of them are in here!. We've got the self-defined "Mr. Rogers" types being almost nauseatingly 'pleasant' and absolutely NON-violent but being able to sneer and talk-down the "inferior" types with a SEG all over their phizz.

The "ostrich syndrome" is very real in human groupings. Folks WANT to see only what is acceptiable to Them. The parallel is that the world only revolves about Them and Theirs and all who don't go around in Their circles should be "eliminated." Deep down they are both ego-driven and don't have the guts to see/experience REALITY.
Reality ain't pleasant 24/7. The universe wan't created to serve Them despite their firm convictions that is was SO (and nyah-nyah).

Excuse me, the Masters are calling and expect me to Serve Them.
Little do they know what I put in Their cervezas. :-)

Irreverently yours,
LA

Hmmm..."motor skills." Does that apply to their MOUTH?

"Auditory processing ability." Well, so many hear only what they want to hear so I guess they DO have some skill at that... :-)

>I'm planning on moving on and am excited by the new potential.

Good for you! Way to go!

Ya know, onct upon a time long ago in a land far, far away
I got assigned to a large HF station in the military. Very impressive to my mind then. Caused me to (eventually) do an about-face on life career goals. Quit Art Center School of Design, went to collitch classes to learn electronic engineering, worked at that until about last week. :-) Got all the collitch degrease I need, no lube jobs to personnel departments needed either. Had a VERY interesting career, fun, challenge, doing what I really liked doing. Liked it so much I did my own electronic and "radio" projects as a hobby, have an indoor workshop to do that, been doing that for 40 years in there.

Now I've been chided, castized, categorized, pilloried and profiled all on acount of NOT GETTING A HAM LICENSE FIRST! MORAL-ETHICAL FELONY! Oooo, Oooo! :-)

Now, what I started out to do in here (and a few other places) was to advocate elimination of the code test. Vigorously. Not to get a "ham ticket." [we already have a coupon for ham at the supermarket...saving it for Easter time] That was DONE. FCC 06-178 is ESTABLISHED FACT and WILL BECOME LAW in roughly three weeks (give or take a few days depending who reads this stuff when...).

> What are you going to do?

I can care less what ol' Spanky gonna do. What I saw him do is ten kinds of hypocritical "enthusiasm" and the usual denial of all his harping about his beloved morse goad. He gonna go on and on and on about his 'history' subjects that he writes about AS IF he were a witness, etc. He got his lil' red-hatted morse monkey helping him post, too.

Maybe I'll think about getting one o them thar "ham tickets" (rather have some Lakers tickets). Maybe I won't. What will it hep me do? "Communicate around the world?" Did that, got lots of T-shirts. "Learn 'radio'?" Already did that, too, made money at it. [collitch degrease did NOT help me 'lubricate the ways' was only a personal perq] "Join a pool of trained radio operators?!?" Ya gotta be kidding! WTF did they think I did a half century ago?!? "Show my 'dedication' to the ARS?!?" WTF do they think the 'ARS' IS?!? If I want or need spiritual guidance I'll go down to All-Saints Church on the end of my street and get help from Pastor Midtlyng. He is closer to God than all these Mighty Masters, the Macho Morsemen, will ever be.

The Four Morsemen of the Apocalypse are still riding but unshod. They've tried to shoo off others and lost their footing. Poor babies. Amateur professionals.

Hmmm...some shows on HGTV cable channel are shot just a mile-plus from here over in Burbank. Maybe I'll make a few local calls and see if anyone wants to make some noise about that. Sorry, the FOOD channel is already doing shows about ham for Easter. :-)

>Thing one - there never will be a huge number of hams.

True. "The FEW, the Proud, the United States Hams!"

Well, the lack of sales-marketing efforts to buy ad space in amateur radio periodicals caused at least 2 1/2 ham magazines to quit in the USA in the last two decades. That was happening even as the numbers of licensees were peaking about three years ago.

I agree with you there. As an admitted "old timer"
I know what my chronological contemporaries are like and do NOT like some of it.

Sure. It's an excellent hobby with great learning-of-new-technology capability on top of it.

>Fun, fun, fun, fun for everyone!

No, I disagree. There are lots of controlled-mind pedants
(some with black uniforms) in here who DEMAND Perfect Professionalism in an amateur activity. One MUST do as they say..."or else." They are the Masters and disrespect of them is Forbidden!

It is Great FUN for Them. They LIKE putting on their Masters need not heed the "inferior" beings. They are immortal and rule all, know all.

Tsk, FCC 06-178 is going to become LEGAL FACT in a few days.
The Masters still can't come to grips with that, not even if they pile on the nice-nice hypocrisy now as compared to their self-centered, subjective BS of the recent past.

Little people. Amateur professionals.

I think ham radio was the last service that required a code test.

Not gonna happen, the FCC is not likely to want to be saddled with another chore to enforce that.

The best way to demonstrate your code skills is to get on the air and participate in CW QSOs and contests. Enjoy.

Who cares, that government is a bunch of commies... And besides, if the USA government doesn't recognize them, then that USA law would not see anything in that part of the world other than a big empty space.

How about a hint on how the Canadians are feeling about Same here.

What I did was to get a pack of plastic "sheet protectors" and put the various important Amateur Radio papers in them so there's no need to punch holes. Original license, various awards, membership certificates, etc. Inexpensive and easy.

I got up to 30 wpm way back in the late 1960s. Lots of stickers on that certificate!

Perhaps I shall do it all over again, this time with a mill, and my new callsign.

It's already been demonstrated many times, "Leo".

K8MN wrote:

"Did you see the pattern when Len followed up my post with his misinformation?"

Which is exactly what Len does: posts misinformation (factual errors).

And you ("Leo") replied:

"I certainly did - just the right bait to draw you to the lure."

Which is saying that Len intentionally posts misinformation. Some would call that "lying", btw.

Then you wrote:

"Works on Jim, too, because he cannot resist. Every time - without fail!"

Note that last sentence:

"Every time - without fail!"

All you have to do is to look up Len's postings here for the past six months or so. Note how many factual errors he has made in those postings.

Then note how few of his factual errors I have actually challenged/corrected here.

Therefore, your claim of

"Every time - without fail!"

has already been demonstrated to be false.

Len gets so upset over those few corrections...imagine if I did challenge/correct each and every one of his factual errors here.

There's your demonstration.

Len won't be part of a moderated newsgroup, because they won't put up with his behavior. His predictions of how the moderators will behave are clearly nothing more than projections of his behavior as a BBS moderator. IOW, if Len couldn't be impartial, nobody else can.

And Len won't be part of rrap much longer either.

So it's really a moot point, "Leo".

Well, you are the master of the Cl00bat! :)

just how many cl00bats have you gone through with Porchy? I mean, every time you break one over his pointy lil skull, I assume that you have to go and buy a new one.

Thanks for all the feedback.

I have a Tech license but for me that license just says something like, I'm allowed to sail a boat.
For me, a code certificate would complement this saying that I can also swim. Or maybe it's the other way around. In any case, I just think they go well together and having one without the other just doesn't seem right.

You are so intimate with Miccolis that you speak for him?

Miccolis, as usual, INFERRED something but never supplied any details. Inference is NOT fact.

That fine example of the modern American amateur extra, Steven James Robeson was doing that for years. Never supplied ANY true, references of HIS involvement. That is like another who INFERRED combat experience "in a country at war," yet never supplied any references to same.

>I've never been very specific with you about my Vietnam service because >I've seen the kind of things you have done to others.

Bullshit. Rhymes with bluffing. You never did much in Vietnam therefore you don't have any details to supply. You were never in combat against the Viet Cong and at best, got into barracks brawls. It's the Robesin syndrome. You are just a clone of Robesin.

I know exactly what I did in Japan, have even made available a publicly-accessible photo essay on it...plus made a publicly-available digital copy of what my Signal Battalion produced a few years after I was returned to the States.

I am still in contact with both civilian and military personnel who worked at the same signal facilities I did and at the same time. That's not INFERRING anydamnthing.
It is history. It is FACT. It has been reviewed by people that were there and no "faults" or "mistakes" were found.

>I've done no >boasting about my service in Southeast Asia and have not gotten into >specifics.

You said you were "in a country at war." So were millions of other military NON-combatants. You were a REMF.

>I've never claimed any heroics nor have I described any >artillery barrages.

USAF enlisted personnel seldom trained for artillery spotting and only commissioned officers were forward observers for air strikes. I was given training as an artillery spotter in addition to doing regular Signal Corps duties. "Provisional Infantry Platoon" training in basic fighting skills was standard practice in the US Army during the 1950s, involving all those NOT in the "line" outfits (infantry, artillery, armor).

How much military training has Miccolis received?

Answer: NONE. He's never even served his government as a civilian. He wants to "lecture me" on how I treat REAL military veterans? He thinks he is "better" than those who served in the military. Maybe your romance with him is going sour?

>You are the individual who made the now famous sphincter post about what >it was like to undergo an artillery barrage, except that you were never >in an artillery barrage.

It is "famous" only in that you choose to highlight it. But, you should have used the proper word - INFAMOUS.

Factual error, minus one point for Heil.

I was learning how to DIRECT artillery fall as an artillery forward observer. Training. When one battery goofs and a six rounds fall mistakenly within a couple hundred yards of an observer team, one KNOWS what it must feel like to enemies. That includes the cadre who were regular artillerymen. They were definitely NOT happy with what happened.

Another factual error of Heil's, now at two negative points.

>That ties in nicely with your posts over a ten year period here.

You don't believe my PDF on Hal Hallikainen's website is factual? Have you any proof that it is false? Can you testify to that in a court of law? Or are you just testy?

I've stated in the beginning in here, and continuously up to now that my purpose was the advocacy of elimination of the code test for a license. No more, no less. You and other bluffmanship extras kept inferring it was otherwise. FCC 06-178 is a "go for launch." It WILL HAPPEN. Code test go bye-bye. Very, very soon.

Big 5-point Bonus Factual Error on Heil's part, score now at -7.

>You rant about getting into amateur radio but you've >never gotten into amateur radio or even tried to do so.

"Rant?!?" :-) Ooooo! Ooooo!

BIG 25-POINT FACTUAL ERROR! [Heil now at -32!]

Tsk, tsk, tsk...WTF do you think my GETTING INTO big time HF comms was? Three years worth of 24/7 comms, long-haul stuff...NO "license" or morse code skill required. Did you think a single test sitting for a First Radiotelephone (Commercial) license was an easy thing that one could just waltz through?!? In 1956. 90-mile train trip to Chicago (no snow, no hills, kept shoes on during that March trip).

Riiiight...you consider a whole working career in electronics (including "radio"), relying on a paycheck for food and shelter to be a NOTHING compared to the almighty high-rate-morse-tested amateur extra rank-status-privilege you puff out your chest about? Wow, all that from an EX-federally-employed State Department "veteran" who got to be Mr. DX complete with living accomodations. Riiiight...we real workers in the electronics industry are all pikers in your pointy little mind, couldn't possibly be as saintly as you pensioners. To you the real Pros must seem less than shit, worse than river-bottom slime, right?

Sweaty, my 1951 high school yearbook has a mention of "work done towards amateur radio." In real ink on real paper. Wanna see? Wanna shove it up yer bum? After the ignorance of adolescence I got into the REAL world. Realized that AMATEUR radio was a HOBBY, not the "profession" that so many want to imagine in their own fantasies.

Now, a HOBBY is a fine thing. I am still fascinated by "radio" (a subset of the larger, miraculous technology of ELECTRONICS). I stay aware and informed about as much as I can and, once in a while, do some work for actual money! That limits what I've been doing for a hobby for over a half century (the last 42 years in my center-of-the-house workshop, rebuilt to that by me).
No sweat. It's all enjoyable.

Why do you think you are so double-damned "important"
that you can act so arrogant, bossy, and self-righteous in here? Amateur radio is basically a HOBBY. "Radio" technology is neither a secret to nor separate from all other radio services in the USA. The FCC doesn't restrict communications from ONLY amateurs about the amateur radio service. It doesn't restrict ANY citizen from commenting on ANY US civil radio service. Got that, pale rider?

After 23 Feb 07 there will be NO requirements for morse code skill to obtain ANY amateur radio license.
Yet you just can't get it, can you? Your years of posturing and preening as the mighty macho morseman
"masters" are of NO value except to you and other pale riders of the Four Morsemen of the Apolcalypse.

>Do you have your finger on the pulse of amateur radio, Leonard?

No, only what the ARRL and a handful of other ham radio websites show. The ARRL is, or very shortly will be, in a crisis condition on memberships. They need the members to sustain their proof-of-readership so that they can sell ad space in QST to keep it alive. Their large publication and re-sell business side of the house is making all the cash that sustains their "free" services for members.

If I want fairy stories all I need to do is tickle one of the self-righteous, self-defined "experts in radio" (morsemen all) to hear fairy stories about the "service to the nation" of hamateur radio. Lord knows they want to spout that shit often enough in here without provocation.

If I want REAL information on US amateur radio, I can go to dozens of friends and acquaintences, people I KNOW, have worked with, are friends in-person, not the pseudo-friendship of on-line-only familiarity. They will level with me. YOU will NOT. You never have.

>One who has passed a Morse Code exam or an amateur radio written exam

Ooooo! Oooooo! I guess you think you "really told me" dintcha? :-)

I've never gotten a Masters degree, never gotten a PhD, never breast-fed an infant, never put on women's clothing, never done a cylinder replacement on a car engine, never cured cancer, never climbed Mt. Everest, never tried out to be an astronaut, never flew an ultra-light, never "pioneered the (radio) airwaves" in the 1930s, never did hang-gliding, never ran a marathon, never stood watch on 500 KHz as a coastie, never "slept with" a man, never got divorced, never ran away from a good fight.

Wanna call me a "failure?!?" Wanna pick up those teeth of yours littering the floor? :-)

>You're still sitting on the >sidelines, telling us which play the coach should have sent in.

"Telling YOU something?" IMPOSSIBLE! Nobody can tell YOU what you don't want to hear.

"Sidelines:" Attempt at a metaphor. A typical football (American version) is a hundred yards long, narrow.
But, it is bordered by THE REST OF THE WORLD! 99+ percent of all the rest of the world ARE on the "sidelines!"

I live in the real world. Not some closed, private little enclave of dreamers thinking They are some kind of masters of radio. Little men. Pretenders at being professional as amateurs. Oxymoronic. Brain damage from lack of honest oxygen, turning into moronic mumblers
about "superiority."

Keep your mighty Rank-Status-Titles as long as you can.
It seems to be all you have...besides bigotry and sociopathy rampant in your clan and sept. Little man.

Don't know much about FISTS, but you are correct about the ARRL. They have two programs... code practice and qualifying runs. If you qualify, send in your copy, and they send you a certificate for whatever the speed was.

Every once in a while I try to copy the slow code practice, not the qualifying run, it still doesn't thrill me after 20 years.

I have so little feelings for it that its hard for me to imagine it an issue. I only brought it up because it was "on-topic," not that I had an interest in it.

Our Division Director, Jim Weaver, is highly proficient at keeping the division informed.

> Perhaps it is the choice of operating mode that offends you for some reason?

Copying a code tape in a classroom does not offend me. Copying code practice on the air does not offend me. Copying a qualifying run on the air and sending in for a certificate does not offend me. Using code in a two way communication does not offend me.

Is this something I want my League spending money on? Sure, I don't care. If it help these guys get over their loss... it will be money well spent.

Do you read my posts? I've more than once posted that I have maybe a hundred or more posters from the rra groups in my bozo bin. I haven't seen a post from Mr Morgan for a long long time, until he started posting in rec.radio.amateur.antenna when the gang started branching out. That's what prompted me to get Xnews, and all those problems go away.

But here is the crucial difference. I choose who I see and who I don't see. Not you, not some group of "moderators" who don't like someone, or have arbitrary reasons about what is right or wrong to post.

Perhaps you don't understand what might be important about that.
Perhaps you like it that way.

Possibly. I think I really p*d off one of the moderators though.
He was responding to every off topic post with orders to not reply to the posts. I ended up telling him that he was every bit as bad as the sicko's. I expect that he might find problems with my posts. I wouldn't have much recourse, I suppose. Whatever.

That is part of the problem. Len has called me a few things in the past - one of my favorites is the "fifth wheel on the four morsemen of the apocolypse". But frankly when he does th einsult thing, I almost always laugh. His humor and approach is caustic. But I can handle that.

I have to imagine that you do too. I mean you don't take this stuff seriously, do you. I imagine that you enjoy th everbal dueling that you two do. Sure the old bp might raise for a second or two , but it's good fun.

There are people who have him killfiled in rraa. Cecil really loves a good argument and is pretty tenacious. A lot of people don't likr that.

Ain't that the truth. But I fugured that with 4 keystrokes, I could eliminate any one of his different names. I can do that with a lot less effort than he can sign up for new accounts.

Why the heck would anyone do that, anyhow?

Of course. Don't confuse me with the people who are worried that they won't be able to carry on their tirades because of moderation. I just have some philosophical problems with moderation. I've seen it strangle groups.

Okay. I find it a little surprising though. Most people who stand

We're going to hold beginners classes in everything from soldering to component identification to simply operating a HF radio to running amplifiers. The whole shebang. No assumptions that the new guy or gal is knowledgeable or that they are an idiot and not worth the effort.

I will hold that that is a bit of a change.

You can contact me off list if you want to know why I have developed a different attitude toward the people who have a problem with people like me and will probably have a much bigger problem with people who have no code test at all. I won't discuss it here.

I have no interest in playing spelling cop. I usually bring up spelling in response to someone complaining about other people's spelling. WA8ULX and K4YZ/K4CAP were famous for complaining about other people all the while making their own mistakes.

K8MN has a need to correct other people as well, and has stated that people who make spelling mistakes shouldn't have positions of leadership. Then he made a spelling error.

Good question - other than announcements stating that code testing was ending down there, I haven't seen much discussion on the subject.

The great code test debate was settled here a while back with little fanfare - and surprisingly little mudslinging between the two sides.

Probably the same down there - this little corner of heaven notwithstanding..... :)

And the world did not end! (doomsayers take note) :)

Next up looks like a new "Foundation" licence category may be on the way, to encourage those who only want to communicate using simple ham radios to join in. This license would require bare minimum study and testing - after all, using one of the modern 2-meter handhelds isn't any more complex than using an FRS handheld - add how to use a repeater, and some simple procedures and protocol, and they're good to go! (Australia and England have already done this, IIRC).

Wonder if that's something which will start up down your way too? (or perhaps the Tech license already fills this requirement?) I'd bet that discussion would keep the 'regulars' on this group busy for the next decade!

What sort of trouble, Mike?

That's good.

Exactly.

I agree!

And I propose that those who refer to more-experienced/more-knowedgeable hams as "fossils", "dinosaurs", "Luddites", "beepers", and a host of other derogatory nicknames are doing it the wrong way, too.

How? There's a whole bunch of factors going on.

For one thing, the "Technician level" includes everyone from the VHF/UHF centric ham who got his/her license 50-odd years ago, and the newcomer who got one last week. It includes hams who never passed a code test and hams who passed 5 wpm in front of the steely-eyed FCC examiner. Hams who passed the new 35 question Element 2, hams who passed the old pre-2000 30 question Element 2 (Novice) and 35 question Element 3A, (Tech) and pre-1987 hams who passed the even older Element 3 (General/Tech) written exams.

It includes hams who are very active, hams who are totally inactive, and everything in between.

And it includes hams who are waiting for Feb 23 so they can upgrade without a code test, and hams who have no interest in upgrading at all.

Perhaps we will see a massive upgrading to General and Extra after Feb 23. I hope we do.

License class is only one indicator of technical skills and knowledge.

My point is that technical knowledge and skills are not the only things a ham should know.

IMHO, a "real ham" has technical knowledge, technical/practical skills, regulatory knowledge, and operating skills.

That's excellent!

Perhaps in detail, but not in basic philosophy.

Take a look at the Glowbugs and Elecraft reflectors if you get the chance. Online Elmering and technical/operating discussions. All sorts of help to newcomers and oldtimers alike.

And while they are both moderated reflectors, the moderators take a laid-back attitude and rarely if ever step in. Nor do they need to.

I suggest you take a look at them if you are interested in either subject.

All of it over the course of ten years or so?

How about you coming up with a quote. Aren't you up to it?

One can do with it, whatever one wishes. For expressing pride to others, one could display it. For the purpose of pride to oneself, it need not be displayed. just knowing it was earned is satisfaction in itself.

Not quite. There's still a Morse proficiency requirement for the Radiotelegraph licenses: http://wireless.fcc.gov/commoperators/exam.html. Unlike the Amateur exams, the speed requirement depends on the class of license, and whether or not any aids are used. Tests are for both receiving and sending.

Allow me to paraphrase Leonard Anderson and advise you that this is a public newsgroup where anyone may respond to any post.

You aren't quoting Jim correctly and you know it.

Let's face it, Len. You don't know if Steve's statements are accurate or not. Confirmation of his USMC service can easily be found on the web. Did you ever find it?

References? I need to supply you references?

Let's review facts, shall we? I served in Vietnam, a country which was at war during my service. I drew combat pay for the entire period of that Vietnam service.

No, Len, the two don't rhyme. I've done no bluffing at all.

I could supply you with plenty of details. I've advised that you could easily find almost exactly what I did elsewhere on the internet. Look for it or not, I don't care.

Fact: You have no idea what I did in Vietnam.

No, Leonard, I was never even in a barracks shoving match.

My service, like yours, is also history and fact. The big difference is that I haven't shared my history with you. Now what?

Yes, I wrote that because it is fact.

I understand that there were others in Vietnam. I never claimed to be the only person serving there.

You simply don't know that. You don't have any information. We can see what you do without facts and we know what you've written about others when you have a few facts.

You never put that into practice. You weren't serving in a war zone.

The word "infamous" works well. I'll be happy to highlight it if Jim

I made no factual error there, Len.

This is your third variant in the fantasy tale. In the first, you describe a combat experience. More recently you've told us that another soldier told you what it was like. Now we have this training scenario.

What's the factual error--not being able to tell the difference between

I moved the "You rant about getting into amateur radio but you've never gotten into amateur radio or even tried to do so" portion of my quote text back to where it belongs to illustrate the lengths you'll go to in order to create diversion, to pretend that my words were about something else. You tale about the artillery barrage you were never in relates to the amateur radio service you were never in.

So? Who asked you?

No more, no less.

Now you've told a deliberate falsehood, Len. It has never been less, but it has mostly been much, much more.

I'm not familiar with the term "bluffmanship extras". What does it mean to you? Did you mean to use the term "Extras." If so, what does the term "bluffmanship" convey?

It was not about getting into amateur radio. It was a story you've told countless times here, but it was not about getting into amateur radio.

Great, Len. A number of us have experience with long haul HF communications for periods of much longer than three years.

Right, 'cuz it wasn't about getting into amateur radio.

Nope. That isn't about getting into amateur radio either.

No, Len, I've never said it is NOTHING or even nothing. It isn't about getting into amateur radio.

I didn't compare any of it to obtaining an amateur radio license, Len.
YOU keep trying to tie all of that in somehow.

I'm sorry that it bothers you that my work permitted me to operate from should bother you.

there in your head, isn't it?

I don't know of any radio amateur who is under the illusion that amateur radio is a profession. Interestingly, the FCC nevers refers to amateur radio as a hobby.

You say that a hobby is a fine thing. You post for over ten years to an amateur radio newsgroup. Yet you are not a licensed radio amateur. That's very, very odd.

You've created a self-limiting atmosphere. If it makes you happy, I say continue to the end of your days, Len.

> Why do you think you are so double-damned "important"

Let me turn that around for you, Len. You act arrogant, bossy and self-righteous here and you aren't even involved in amateur radio. You're a non-participant in amateur radio.

> Amateur radio is basically a HOBBY.

What does the FCC call it, Len?

> "Radio"
> technology is neither a secret to nor separate from

The Amateur Radio Service is separate from all other radio services in the U.S.A. Amateur radio is not only about radio technology.

You've commented. You still are not a part of amateur radio.
Got that, wizened geezer?

I knew that.

I got it.

My life isn't going to change over this, Leonard. I'll still do all of the things I've been doing. I still won't run into you on the amateur bands.

Precisely.

That's pretty limiting, don't you think?

There is nothing to indicate that your scenario is based in fact. There simply aren't many free services from the ARRL, Len. It charges additional fees for most things. The DXCC program used to cost the League quite a bit of money. I think it is largely, if not completely self-sustaining these days. That's simply one example. There are numerous others.

> If I want fairy stories all I need to do is tickle one

Oh, that's right, you're some sort of puppet master and we all dance to your tune. ;-) We been hYPnO-tIZeD!

> Lord knows they want

No one has spouted more deliberate distortion and untruths in this newsgroup regarding the state of amateur radio than you, Len.

> If I want REAL information on US amateur radio, I can

I can think of only a few pseudo-friends you have here in the newsgroup, Leonard. I don't care for you at all. Your circle of friends and acquaintances seems to have grown since the last telling.

> They > will level with me.

Maybe they will. Maybe they won't. Maybe some of them are simply pseudo-friends.

> YOU will NOT.

I've leveled with you very often, Len. You didn't like it.

> You never have.

There's another factual error on your part.

>>> Of course you are! C'mon out with the "real reasons."

Now you can add to your list!

> Wanna call me a "failure?!?"

I think there are things in which you've been a success, Len and I believe that there are things in which you've been a failure.
Additionally, there are things you've failed to do. Now I don't know if you ever boasted that you'd lick cancer in a week or climb Everest blindfolded. You did boast seven years back of getting the "Extra right out of the box". It hasn't happened. You never even tried.

> Wanna pick up those

Since I know your age, I'll agree that you mean the smiley in this instance.

Yes, an attempt and a success.

99+ percent of the world don't post to this newsgroup, claim that they know best how to regulate U.S. amateur radio, denigrate and insult radio amateurs, denigrate and insult the ARRL and boast that they're going to get an "Extra right out of the box".

> I live in the real world.

There's not any really solid indication that your statement is factual.
You still seem to think that you are somehow involved, that you're "one of the guys" in amateur radio. The name "Walter Mitty" comes to mind when I think of you.

> Not some closed, private little > enclave of dreamers thinking They are some kind of

None of them have ever written of themselves as "masters of radio" or "gods of radio". You've done so.

> Little men.

The little men have done something you haven't done. They'll continue to do so long after you've gone.

> Pretenders at being > professional as amateurs. Oxymoronic.

None have claimed that they are "professional as amateurs". Certainly none have claimed to be "pretenders at being professional as amateurs". Sure, it's an oxymoron. It is YOUR oxymoron.

> Brain damage
> from lack of honest oxygen, turning into moronic mumblers

Sure, Len, we all sit around breathing that dishonest oxygen when we aren't breathing regular air.

> Keep your mighty Rank-Status-Titles as long as you can.

There are always folks better at something than others. There are always folks who can meet the established requirements for partaking in an endeavor and there are those who can't.

I told you that you don't know me. You have precious little in the way of fact.

> Little man.

I'm a large man, Len and I've stomped the old terra. I've enjoyed 43 years of amateur radio and I plan to enjoy another decade or two.

I'm not pained to see that you won't be joining in on the fun.

Maybe you're incapable of putting two and two together, Len.
"Foghorn Lenhorn" makes an appearance whenever you start your "Herr Oberst, Kolonel Klunk, Sister Nun of the Above" routine. You get what you give.

I know that pornography exists. I don't choose to view it. It goes against my values. We all make value judgements. Dee killfiled you because you were insulting and she didn't choose to be insulted by you.
As I pointed out to you, she is the nice lady who has a lovely home.
An unsightly landfill was built next to her home. She built a tall fence so she wouldn't have to look at the landfill. In this story, you play the part of the landfill.
